CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 9, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, it has been said of old where there is no vision the people perish. Every question presented to us is impressive with its future consequences. Every problem bears heavy upon us, because it bears in its train the welfare of those coming after us. We pray that we may realize the importance of every issue that is presented, and that there may be no disposition in any of us to tax the future for present gain. Where duty calls may we be enabled to make the supreme sacrifice. Hear us to-day for Thy blessing upon us in guiding us in thought, in heart, in purpose, in will, that Thy will may be done and Thy righteousness may be established among this people. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, before any business is transacted, there being only half a dozen Senators on the other side, I think we ought to have a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Page	Stone

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an increase in the estimates submitted by the Treasury Department for salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue from $2,150,000 to $2,190,000, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF GEORGE WRIGHT, DECEASED.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Court of Claims, requesting, pursuant to an order of the court, the return of the order of dismissal in the cause of the Estate of George Wright, deceased, v. United States. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Claims, and, there being no objection, the papers will be returned to the Court of Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 4657. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of W. H. Derwin Camp, No. 5, United Spanish War Veterans, of Manchester, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and minor children of veterans of the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have the following telegram from C. L. Brokaw, of Kansas, sent from Hutchinson. It reads:

Kansas State Sunday School Convention petition earnestly for speedy enactment of greatly needed Smith-Hughes bill, to establish Federal censorship of motion pictures.

I desired to read the telegram, and I wish to state that I believe the proposition is a good one and the measure ought to be passed. I ask that the telegram may be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WORKS presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry organizations and churches in the State of California, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, and for the enactment of legislation to provide for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from an executive committee representing 52 importers and wholesale liquor merchants of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CLARENCE HAZELBAKER.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2630) for the relief of Clarence Hazelbaker, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 503) thereon.

HENRY LA ROQUE.

Mr. CLAPP. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 14229) for the relief of Henry La Roque, and I submit a report (No. 502) thereon. This is a measure which has passed the House, giving a right of appeal to an Indian allottee, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Henry La Roque, an Indian of the White Earth Indian Reservation, in the State of Minnesota, be, and he is hereby, permitted to appeal within 90 days after the passage of this act from the decree entered in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit on the 8th day of July, 1912, in a suit wherein the United States is the appellant and Henry La Roque the appellee, to the Supreme Court of the United States, giving such notice or notices and taking such proceedings as are required by law and practice in such cases to effect such appeal. To enable such appeal to be taken and perfected the time therefor and for all notices and proceedings provided in the law or practice to be given or taken is hereby extended until the expiration of the period of 90 days from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. For what purpose was the bill read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If I understand the bill, I think I shall have to object to it.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the Senator will not object to this bill. It is the case of an Indian allottee, where the decision was made, and for want of funds he was unable to take his appeal within the time. It is in defense of an Indian's right, not aggressively against the Indian. The bill simply grants him the right of an appeal.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand the general law provides for all cases of this sort, and I think we ought to go very moderately in restoring the right to appeal where the right to appeal does not exist. I myself believe that the bill ought to have been considered by the Judiciary Committee. I do not know whether it has been or not.

Mr. CLAPP. If the bill would confer the right of appeal upon a full citizen, I would not think for a moment of asking for its passage. It is in behalf of one of the wards of the Nation. The bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and when I called the attention of some members of the Judiciary Committee to the fact they very readily conceded, and the chairman conceded at once, that the bill should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. We are dealing with a ward, not changing the right of appeal as to citizens of this country.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not changing the general law, but changing the rules which have been laid down and the law as it now exists in regard to court procedure. I do not believe that should be done in this way. I shall have to ask the Senator to let the bill go over to-day at least.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the rights of any third parties are involved in the case, or is it simply a question between the United States and the Indian?

Mr. CLAPP. As I understand it, it is simply a question between the United States and the Indian. He brought suit under the statutes to enforce his right to an allotment, and the Secretary refused to make the allotment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is against the Government?

Mr. CLAPP. It is against the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The rights of no private person are involved in the matter whatever?

Mr. CLAPP. Not as I understand. The bill was favorably reported on by the department and it passed the House. If the bill undertook to interfere with the judiciary laws or to give the right of appeal to a citizen, of course it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, but the question whether we shall confer upon a ward this particular right, where it has lapsed because of his inability for want of means to bring his appeal, it seems to me is clearly within the purview of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suppose, Mr. President, if we choose to do so we could pass an act granting to the Indian this particular land.

Mr. CLAPP. Why, certainly; and such a bill would not go to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And to a bill of that sort, Mr. President, I should not raise the slightest objection.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, the Senator can enter his objection and let the bill go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the calendar.

FRANK ELLSWORTH M'CORKLE.

Mr. BRISTOW. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 3432) to reinstate Frank Ellsworth McCorkle as a cadet at the United States Military Academy, and I submit a report (No. 504) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It will not take much time.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator what is the reason for this bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. This bill is for the relief of one of the six boys who were discharged some time ago for drinking beer, as the Senator will remember. All of them, except this one, have been reinstated, and this bill proposes to reinstate him and it has passed the House. He was in the same party and did exactly the same thing as the other boys, nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. JONES. Why was he not included in the other bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. He was just omitted; that is all.

Mr. JONES. I suppose, under the circumstances and in view of the passage of the other bill, he should be put upon the same basis as the others, of course.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to reappoint as cadet at the United States Military Academy, without regard to age or the existence of vacancies, Frank Ellsworth McCorkle.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to the resolution, who, I think, is in a hurry for it.

The resolution (S. Res. 354) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on December 19, 1913, entitled "Western Apples: How and When to Use Them," by Mr. John P. Hartman, of Seattle, Wash., be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not object to the resolution, as it is a small matter; but I will object to other similar requests, because I think that if we are ever to get rid of the business on the calendar we must have the bills as they are reported go to the calendar. Then Senators will become sufficiently interested in them to enforce the consideration of bills on the calendar.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I realize the force of what the Senator says, and I would not make the request only from the fact that this matter has been unreasonably delayed.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

SENATE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement.

In the sundry civil appropriation act of April 28, 1904 (Stat. L., vol. 33, pt. 1, p. 481), a commission was created to acquire a site and construct the building known as the Senate Office Building. The commission, as created, was composed of Senators Cullom, of Illinois; GALLINGER, of New Hampshire; and Cockrell, of Missouri. When Senator Cockrell left the Senate, Senator Teller, of Colorado, was appointed to the vacancy. Since then Senators Cullom and Teller have died, so that I am now the only surviving member of the commission.

The law provides that—

Any vacancy occurring by resignation or otherwise in the membership of the said commission shall be filled by the presiding officer of the Senate.

I am informed, Mr. President, by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds that it is important that the vacancies on the commission shall be filled, as the work has not been completed, and it is necessary that the commission shall be consulted from time to time. In view of that fact I venture to suggest that the vacancies be filled by the Vice President, as provided by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Vice President fills the vacancies on the commission by the appointment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Thursday next, the 14th instant, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER],

I shall submit some observations on the Panama Canal tolls question.

DEPOSITS OF STATE BANKS AND TRUST COMPANIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4966) proposing an amendment as to section 19 of the Federal reserve act relating to reserves, and for other purposes. If the bill involves any debate whatever I shall not press it at this time. It simply modifies the Federal reserve act by inserting these words:

> If a State bank or trust company is required or permitted by the law of its State to keep its reserves either in its own vaults or with another State bank or trust company or with a national bank, such reserve deposits so kept in such State bank, trust company, or national bank shall be construed within the meaning of this section as if they were reserve deposits in a national bank in a reserve or central reserve city for a period of three years after the Secretary of the Treasury shall have officially announced the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in the district in which such State bank or trust company is situate.

Under the law as it stands it would remove some of the deposits which now are held by State banks and trust companies, being the deposits and reserves of other State banks and trust companies, and it was thought best not to disconcert or interfere with the present order more than was necessary in the establishment of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not had time to examine the bill, and I do not particularly make objection to its consideration now on my own account, but I do feel that there ought to be some questions asked in regard to the measure, and I understand that a number of Senators are interested in it.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that the bill go over, in view of the Senator's statement.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, before the bill goes over, I call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to one point in it which seems not to have attracted notice. The existing law provides:

> Any Federal reserve bank may receive from the member banks as reserves, not exceeding one-half of each installment, eligible paper as described in section 14 properly indorsed and acceptable to the said reserve bank.

There was considerable discussion upon that provision of the law when the bill was pending last year. It was thought by some of us altogether objectionable to allow commercial paper to be used for the reserves of banks. This proposed amendment changes the existing law, so that eligible paper as described in section 13, properly indorsed and accepted by the said reserve bank, may be used. The quantity of paper available for discount under section 13 is much greater than that under section 14. I have only hastily compared this bill with the existing law, but I think it proposes a very material change; and as the bill is to go over, I ask the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to that fact.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator for calling attention to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this matter being up reminds me of another related matter, about which I want to make just one observation. I ask the attention of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and I hope that the committee will remedy the evil to which I am about to refer. I am satisfied that it was an oversight.

The currency bill as it passed provides that to the extent to which member banks can lend upon real estate they must lend upon real estate situated in the reserve district. The lines of the districts run very uncertainly. For example, take the line that runs through the State of Mississippi; it goes from the northern border of Hinds County. The banks below there do business at one place and are members of one district, and those above are members of another. I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that he bring to the attention of his committee an amendment permitting the banks to lend upon real estate either in the reserve district within which a particular bank is situated or in the State in which it is situated. For example, a bank at Jackson can not lend on real estate in Madison County or in Yazoo County—adjoining counties. I give an illustration in my own State, because I am better acquainted with the situation there than anywhere else. It seems to me that condition ought to be remedied at the very earliest opportunity.

These banks have been lending money as State banks upon real estate in these and in the adjoining counties. All that it is necessary to do is at the proper place in the law to insert the words "or the State." It reads now, "the reserve bank district," and if the words "or the State" be inserted I think it will remove the objection.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal tolls bill be now laid before the Senate, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] having given notice that he desires to discuss that matter this morning.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I rise to speak in advocacy of the pending bill to repeal that provision of the Panama Canal bill approved August 24, 1912, which exempts from the payment of tolls vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

I am, of course, aware that on August 6, 1912, I said in the debate that I did not think such exemption was in violation of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that on March 2 of the present year I gave out a statement to the press saying I adhered to that view, although I had decided, for reasons I gave therein, to vote for the repeal of the exemption, and that on March 10 following I had the same statement inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Inasmuch as it has been charged by some parties in Louisiana and also on this floor that I had changed my convictions on this subject in order to meet the views of the President, I deem it proper at this time to allude to the motives that controlled me in 1912 and to those that influenced me in 1914 up to the time of the beginning of the hearings of the Interoceanic Canals Committee.

When I approached the consideration in 1912 of what I may call the legal aspect of the question—the right of the United States to exempt under the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the vessels of her citizens engaged in the coastwise trade—I was conscious of the wish to find that she had that right.

I was influenced in this wish by my strong desire to do what I could conscientiously to stimulate the growth of the merchant marine of our country, the decadence of which I had long regretted, and without making any special examination of the question I hoped that toll exemption might have this effect.

I was also influenced by the desire of the New Orleans commercial bodies, who seemed to think that toll exemption would have the effect of increasing the commercial importance of that port, a result that I would certainly wish to help bring about if I could do so without injury to other sections of my State and country.

It was in this spirit that I approached the consideration of the question of the meaning of rule 1 of article 3 on which the controversy hinged, and which reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

I think it can be readily admitted that there is no patent ambiguity in this language and that the ordinary mind would conclude that under its terms the United States could not give any privilege to any ships of any of its citizens that it did not also give to every ship of every citizen of every other nation. In other words, that the language means what it says. To arrive at any other conclusion it is necessary to read something into the paragraph that is not now there or to construe its language with reference to laws not mentioned therein.

As stated in my Senate speech of 6th August, I arrived at my conclusion by reasoning that the spirit and object of the article must be sought for in construing it, and while the first part of the disputed paragraph explicitly declared the canal must be free and open to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, yet the second part of it indicated that the spirit and object of it was that there should be no discrimination against any nation, and inasmuch as to my knowledge the existing laws of the United States prevented foreign ships from engaging in her coastwise trade, I drew the general conclusion—a conclusion too hastily drawn as it has since developed—that the exemption of such ships from the payment of tolls charged the ships of other nations, would not operate as a discrimination against such nations or their citizens or subjects.

While my interpretation of the clause may have been somewhat strained, yet it satisfied me and I could advance it without a violation of my intellectual integrity.

I went no further than this in reaching my conclusion, not attempting the feat of mental gymnastics involved in the assumption that the expression "all nations" meant "all other nations."

But after determining that I could honestly uphold the treaty right of the United States to exempt her coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, I was troubled by the further question whether she ought to do so; whether justice to all her citizens who had contributed to the great expense of building the canal and would contribute to the expense of its operation would permit her to relieve a part of them, the owners of the coastwise vessels, from contributing through the payment of tolls to the present expense of its operation and the future expense of paying for its construction as well as operation, especially as the parties sought to be thus favored were already so greatly favored by the laws of the country and would in addition be the principal direct pecuniary beneficiaries of this most expensive work.

I very distinctly remember telling my esteemed friend and colleague and deskmate, the junior Senator from New York, of the trouble this phase of the question was causing me, but I finally determined that I could justify myself in giving them this additional governmental favor.

I gave no further particular thought to the subject until about February of the present year, when persistent rumors began to emanate from the public press to the effect that the President believed the exemption clause was not only a violation of the treaty but also economically wrong, and that its retention in the law would most seriously cripple the foreign policies of our Government, and for these reasons he was very anxious for its repeal.

I brooded in my sick chamber over these reports and ended by writing to the President to ask if he would give me a direct expression of his views on the question as to whether he really thought that the retention of the exemption clause would injure our standing with foreign nations and thereby injure our national interests through the prevention of the success of our foreign policies.

I said if he so honestly believed, I would consider it my duty to my country and to him to vote for repeal, without, however, abandoning my convictions as to the legal and moral right of the United States to exempt her coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls if she so desired, which he could not expect me to abandon just because his view of that question differed from my own.

I received a most courteous reply thanking me for the perfect frankness with which I had expressed myself to him, assuring me that, of course, he could not expect me or anyone to change their views of the construction of the treaty because it did not coincide with his own, and advising me that in his judgment the repeal of the exemption clause was absolutely necessary for the continuance of our present friendly relations with foreign powers and the success of our foreign policies; and I then wrote back that I saw it as my duty to uphold his hands in this matter, and that duty I would discharge; and then, in justice to myself, I gave out the press statement of March 2 in order to show why I would support the repeal, which, as taken from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 10, I ask to append hereto as part of my remarks without reading them again to the Senate:

SIGNED STATEMENT BY SENATOR THORNTON FOR THE PRESS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 2, 1914.

When the question of exempting American vessels engaged in our coastwise trade from the payment of Panama Canal tolls was before the Senate, I spoke and voted in favor of the exemption.

I did so believing that the United States had the legal and moral right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to enact such legislation, and hoping its passage might stimulate the upbuilding of our merchant marine and help our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific seaport cities, and without any injury to the interior sections of our country.

Having now concluded after careful thought that when the question of repealing this exemption clause comes again before the Senate it will be my duty to advocate its repeal, I wish in justice to myself to give the reason for my changed attitude.

I believe now just as firmly as before that the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act is not a violation of our treaty obligations, but I recognize now, as I always did, the substantial difference between our right of exemption and our enforcement of that right.

Understanding through newspaper reports only that the President believed our national interests would be subserved by the repeal of the exemption clause in the present law, I have appealed to him directly for an expression of his views.

Responding to my request, he has answered that in his judgment the repeal of the exemption clause is necessary for the continuance of our present friendly relations with foreign powers and the success of our foreign policies.

Considering the canal-tolls-exemption law previously enacted to be a question of policy and not of principle, and recognizing the great responsibility resting on the President for the successful conduct of our foreign relations, and also the delicacy of the present trying situation in regard to those relations, I feel it my public duty to assist the President in carrying out his wishes in this matter.

Of course, my change of attitude, based on my conception of duty, must not be construed as the slightest criticism of my brother Senators who think it their public duty to maintain their former attitude on this question.

J. R. THORNTON.

It was three days later that the President delivered his address to the joint session of the Congress asking for the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama bill; and if I had known that he planned doing this, I would not have troubled him in February by asking for an expression of his views to me individually; and if I had not prior to that address decided to vote for repeal, I would certainly have so decided after its utterance.

I shall vote for it now for other reasons than those given in my published statement; but without the acquisition of knowledge subsequently acquired by me, I should certainly vote for repeal on account of the reasons given by the President in his private letter to me and in his address to the Congress. And for so voting for such reasons, I have no apologies to make to any of my critics in Louisiana or elsewhere.

The question of exempting our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls was not, in my opinion, a question of principle, but of policy only.

Moreover, holding, as I then did, that the United States had the legal right under the treaty to exempt from the payment of tolls the ships of her citizens engaged in coastwise trade, I did not consider that the failure to insist on that right in any way abrogated it, for, as I expressed it in the published statement heretofore mentioned, "I recognize now, as I always did, the substantial difference between our right of exemption and our enforcement of that right," a concrete expression of a general principle applied first by myself on this floor to this special case and since applied to it in the debate by other Senators.

Holding such views, when the President assured me that in his judgment the repeal of the exemption clause was necessary for the continuance of our present friendly relations with foreign powers, and the consequent success of our foreign policies, I considered it was my public duty to the country and to him to assist him in the effort to bring about such a result.

It was not necessary that the President should go into details with me as to how the retention of this exemption clause might endanger our present friendly relation with foreign powers and the success of our foreign policies.

I did not ask for details, but claiming to possess at least ordinary comprehension, I could readily see that the feeling against us among other nations, due to their belief that we were discriminating against them through what they considered a perversion of the treaty on our part, might naturally lead them to discriminate against us in commercial relations that it was greatly to our interest to preserve in order that we could maintain and enhance if possible the opportunities of increasing the sales of our home products in the markets of those foreign nations, a matter of much greater importance to the general prosperity of our country than the matter of permitting a limited number of our citizens engaged in one industry to increase their profits through the tolls exemption.

And my position that the opinion of the President, that from motives of policy we should repeal the exemption, justified me in agreeing to his wish, is backed up by the opinion of ex-Senator J. B. Foraker, who appeared before the Interoceanic Canals Committee to speak against repeal, and who is considered by the friends of free tolls here as one of their star witnesses, who said to the committee:

It is a question of what our power is; and if President Wilson had said as good policy he thought we ought to repeal the exemption clause, I would not have felt like opposing it; I would have been satisfied with his judgment on the subject. In view of what he said. But when he put it on the ground that we did not have the power to do what had been done, that made it a different sort of a proposition.

In this connection I wish to deny most emphatically the statements made in the toll-exemption press, and also by Senators who should know better, that the President, in his address to the joint session of Congress, asked that the exemption clause be repealed because he considered it a violation of the treaty, and that he claimed we should accede to the English view whether it was right or wrong on our part to do so; and that Senators were weakly surrendering their convictions or opinions on the question because of the personal views of the President thereon; and these unjustifiable charges have been widely disseminated for the purpose of influencing sentiment against repeal and also for discrediting the administration.

As for the "right-or-wrong" proposition that has been harped on here and elsewhere, anyone who heard or will read the address, and who has an ordinary regard for his own intellectual perception, should be very careful about making such a loose statement as that the President said we should take this step whether it was "right or wrong."

The most ordinary mind can see that the point made by the President was that in view of the conditions previously mentioned by him we should reverse our action in the exemption matter without raising the question whether we were right or wrong in our interpreting the treaty as authorizing us to relieve our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls.

As for asking that the clause be repealed because he thought it contravened the treaty, the President made no such request.

I have already said that in his private letter to me he expressly disclaimed the idea of asking me to change my view on that question because it differed from his own, and in his public address to the joint session, while frankly stating that in his opinion the exemption was not only a violation of the treaty but an economic error as well, he said in express language that he had not come to urge his personal views on the Congress, but asked that in support of the foreign policy of the administration we voluntarily withdraw from a position which was questioned by every foreign nation.

That was the ground on which he asked for the repeal, and that was the reason he gave for his request.

I repeat that it was a sufficient reason for me to be willing to accede to it, and I am not conscious that in so doing I was surrendering either my intelligence or my independence.

All this happened before the recent report of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries on "Investigation of Shipping Combinations" had been brought to my attention and before the recent hearings of the Senate Interoceanic Canals Committee had been held.

This report and these hearings have completely changed my views on the moral and economic questions involved in the exemption from tolls of the ships of American citizens engaged in the coastwise trade, and I now believe that the President is right on both the legal or moral and on the economic side of this question.

I knew before, of course, that these vessels had under the law a complete monopoly of the great coastwise carrying trade of this country, and I knew that there was no Government regulation of their rates, as there is in the case of the railroads of the country; but I did not know before that, with reference now to the Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade, it was practically a trust-controlled interest through private understandings between the vessel owners that could not be reached by law, and that practically no competition exists among them either as to territory served or rates charged, with the resultant effect that their charges are regulated not by the cost of operation but by the ability of the owners to make the traffic pay all it will bear, and that this is the rule followed by these coastwise shipping interests.

I know that in view of this showing, which places this coastwise shipping interest in a very unenviable light before the country, the advocates of tolls exemption for it would like to have it appear that this combination is due to railroad control of these ships, and either directly or indirectly they strive to convey that impression when alluding to it; but the report shows that only 54.5 per cent of the total number of steamers and 61.9 per cent of the tonnage is railroad owned, while the great proportion of the remainder belongs to shipping consolidations which have their private agreements as to rates and territory, and the small remainder to independent lines, which, however, rarely serve the same ports, so that competition is practically eliminated.

The same condition is shown to prevail on the Pacific coast, except that a greater proportion of the ships is owned by the shipping consolidations than by the railroads, and there is somewhat more of competition among the independent lines.

The coastwise shipping business of the country is shown to be in a most flourishing condition, declaring large dividends and with all the ships necessary to transact all the coastwise trade, which is of great extent.

This is the interest which, in addition to the monopoly it already enjoys, we are asked to subsidize to the extent of the tolls which it is proposed to donate them.

Subsidy is a word that rather grates on the sensibilities of many men of all present political parties in this country, though perhaps it is more obnoxious generally to those reared in the principles of the Democratic Party than to those who owe allegiance to other political parties; and it is not surprising that the Democratic members of this body who are inclined to vote against repeal should balk at the idea of calling this toll remission to coastwise vessels a subsidy.

Yet it can not be denied that it is a subsidy for all practical purposes, and ex-President Taft says he approved of the measure because it was a subsidy, and two Senators, one from New Hampshire and the other from Massachusetts, one favoring the tolls-exemption law and the other opposing it, have in the recent debate on this question frankly claimed that it would be a subsidy, an economic policy, however, which each of them considers justifiable.

As for myself, I do not hesitate to say that the effect of remitting tolls to American coastwise vessels using the Panama Canal is to subsidize an existing trust-controlled monopoly.

Just as the report of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the "Investigation of Shipping Combinations" changed my views on the economical aspect of this question, so has the recent testimony produced before the Senate Interoceanic Canals Committee changed my views on the moral or legal side of it, for they are combined.

The testimony, oral and written, of Mr. White and Mr. Choate, the first our chargé d'affaires at London and the second our ambassador there at the time of the negotiation of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and who conducted it with the representatives of Great Britain, shows conclusively to any mind open to conviction that the understanding of both sides was that under the terms of the treaty the United States would not have the right to exempt any of the ships of her citizens, coastwise or foreign, from the payment of tolls if the ships of the citizens of other nations were made to pay them.

This point had already been brought out through letters of these gentlemen to Senator McCUMBER, written in response to letters of inquiry from himself, and were made public by being made a part of his great and illuminating speech, delivered in the Senate on the 6th April last; and these letters also declared that the words of the treaty, "all nations" and "equal terms," were understood to refer to the United States as well as to all other nations by every one of those, American or British, who had anything to do with its negotiation from its inception to its close.

Mr. White appeared in person before the committee and fully confirmed his written statement.

On account of a temporary illness Mr. Choate could not appear, but wrote that his position was clearly set forth in his letter to Senator McCUMBER and in a recent letter to Mr. White, which was filed; and in further corroboration of his position, by permission of the Department of State, he submitted copies of the entire correspondence between himself and Mr. Hay, our Secretary of State, giving full details of the negotiations from beginning to end.

This correspondence can be found in No. 6 of the committee hearings, and throws a flood of light on the situation.

If this knowledge had been in my possession when I advocated tolls exemption in the Senate in 1912, it would have been impossible for me to arrive at the conclusion I did, for the very course of reasoning that impelled me to arrive at that conclusion would necessarily have forced me to arrive at a diametrically opposite conclusion.

Moreover, the testimony before the committee shows conclusively that under our present laws it is entirely possible for discrimination to be practiced against other nations by exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, showing that the position of Great Britain on this question, as contained in the note of Mr. Innes to Mr. Knox—

> If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken. But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping, and consequently in an infraction of the treaty—was well taken.

I have noticed that the advocates of free tolls have, with a rather reckless disregard for facts, always, when speaking of this statement, mentioned it as a direct acquiescence by Great Britain in our right to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, in spite of the fact that it is qualified by the words "may be," which they never mention except when obliged to do so in quoting the exact language; and then they invariably leave off the conclusion of the paragraph which states that the British Government thinks it would be impossible to frame such regulations.

I am, therefore, now convinced that we have not the moral right to grant this exemption, and would vote for repeal on that ground alone, but reiterate my previous statement that I could find ample justification for myself in voting for it on the grounds mentioned by the President in his private letter to me and in his public address to the joint session of the Congress—the maintenance of the success of our present foreign policies which is dependent on the preservation of our present friendly relations with foreign powers.

If I understand the position of the advocates of free tolls for American coastwise ships, which seems, however, to shift as often as the necessities of their inherently weak and rapidly failing cause before the country requires new positions to be taken, their principal grounds of opposition to repeal are:

First. That the exemption does not violate the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because the term "all nations" does not include the United States, but means "all other nations"; and even if it does include the United States, our coastwise ships would not be barred from the exemption of payment of tolls, because it would not operate as a "discrimination" against other nations, due to the fact that their ships are forbidden by law to engage in our coastwise trade.

Second. That owing to the change of conditions since the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, at which time it was contemplated by the contracting parties that the Nicaraguan route would be used, and as we have built by the Panama route, having acquired the sovereignty by purchase, the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty do not apply, and we can use the canal without any limitations whatever.

Third. As we built the canal with our own money, we can do as we please with it.

Fourth. That tolls exemption will stimulate the growth of our merchant marine.

Fifth. That tolls exemption will enable the American vessels using the canal to compete successfully with the transcontinental railroads, which they can not do otherwise, and thereby freight rates will be lowered and the public get the benefit; and as a corollary to this, if you do not agree to tolls exemption, you are under railroad influence.

Sixth. That to repeal the present tolls-exemption provision would be a "cowardly act" and "an abject surrender" to the demand of a foreign power amounting to "national dishonor" and "dragging the flag in the dirt," and as a corollary to this, those who will so vote are not patriots, but "traitors."

I think this is a fairly comprehensive statement of the grounds used by the opponents of repeal in the public press and oral argument, which I shall now alude to in the order mentioned.

First. I have already said in this address that when I thought in 1912, with the lights then before me, that we could without violation of the treaty relieve our coastwise vessels it was on the ground solely, as I then stated, that it would not be a discrimination against other nations for the reason I mentioned, and that I did not attempt the feat of mental gymnastics involved in the assumption that the expression "all nations" meant "all other nations," and I now freely confess my inferiority in mental agility to those of my colleagues who hold that view; but, as I have also said, the recent letters and statements of Mr. White and Mr. Choate expressly declare that all the parties on both sides who negotiated the treaty understood at all times that the term "all nations" included the United States as well as other nations.

As to the question of no discrimination by the exemption of our coastwise vessels, I have stated that the evidence taken before the Senate committee very distinctly shows that such discrimination could exist.

Second. As to the question of change of conditions since the treaty and the abandonment of the contemplated Nicaraguan route for the present Panama route and our acquisition of sovereignty over the canal and the consequent abrogation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it seems to me most strange that such a position can be gravely taken.

Those who heard or have read the evidence before the Senate Canals Committee in the shape of the letters sent by Ambassador Choate to Secretary Hay will see that the very contingency was suggested and provided for; that it was considered by the representatives of Great Britain that the United States might finally conclude to build through Panama and acquire territory for that purpose; but it was agreed that the words inserted in the treaty—

> The construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient—covered the possible contingency.

Moreover, the treaty between the United States and Colombia to admit of our building a canal through Panama, entered into on January 22, 1903, distinctly provided in article 16:

> The canal, when constructed, * * * shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with, all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901—which was the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

And the treaty with Panama entered into on the 18th of November, 1903, to permit of the building of the canal, in article 18 repeated verbatim the language of article 16 of the Colombian treaty just quoted; and yet some contend that now the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty have no application whatever to the management of the canal by the United States.

Third. I do not know how to answer the statement that as we built the canal with our own money we therefore have the right to do as we please with it, except by saying that, even if we did build it with our own money, we did so on certain conditions prescribed in advance in solemn treaty obligations.

Yet a great number of the people of this country who are not informed on the subject are influenced by this argument as those opponents of repeal who are better informed wish them to be influenced.

Fourth. If tolls exemption would really stimulate the growth of our merchant marine, the proposition would, in my judgment, be well worthy of consideration; but how will it stimulate it? It can not stimulate the growth of American vessels engaged in the foreign trade, because these ships that have to compete on most unequal terms with the ships of all other nations are denied the privilege of tolls exemption which is sought to be accorded to the ships of the coastwise trade that have no competition whatever with the ships of other nations, which are forbidden our coastwise trade.

If I could only see my way to give tolls exemption to our foreign ships without a violation of our treaty obligations, I might be willing to do so; but, with the lights that are now before me, I would never consent to giving tolls exemption to our coastwise ships.

All the vessels needed for our present coastwise commerce are now in use transporting that commerce; and, of course, if the business is increased, as it will be, by the use of the canal, all the vessels needed for the increased commerce will be forthcoming.

This is so because no other vessels can be used in that trade, and it stands to reason that as many boats will be used as found profitable to use; and, as no other ships can be used, it necessarily follows that the question of the imposition or nonimposition of tolls can cut no possible figure in the number of ships that will be built, that fact depending entirely on the amount of trade developed by the opening of the canal, though I admit that it might have some effect on the rates charged by these coastwise boats if their owners wished to regulate their freight charges solely by their operating expenses.

Fifth. The claim that tolls exemption is necessary to permit the coastwise ships to compete successfully with the transcontinental railroads or to make the railroads reduce their rates for coast-to-coast freight, which, of course, is the only freight that could be moved by the water route, is one that is greatly relied on to spread the tolls-exemption propaganda.

It is, however, more of an appeal to prejudice than to reason and when examined in the light of the evidence submitted is shown to be without merit; yet it largely answers the purpose of the advocates of tolls exemption.

The testimony submitted to the Senate committee establishes the fact that the all-water route for freight will be not only shorter in point of time but also about one-third cheaper, provided the rate is judged by operating expenses.

This establishes the fact that the railroads can not possibly compete with the boats on anything like even terms on this species of freight, but it by no means establishes the fact that the boats will charge in proportion to the expense of transportation.

On the contrary, the testimony of the Government experts indicates most strongly the fact that the boats will fix their rates just sufficiently below the railroad rates as to secure the traffic, and a small margin will do this.

In other words, that the boats will charge all the traffic will bear, just as they do now in the coastwise trade, through the Government monopoly that is given them and the shipping consolidations they have formed among themselves whereby competition among themselves has been eliminated.

The natural business idea with them will be to charge all they can get, just as they are doing now and just as the railroads did before they were placed under governmental supervision, and just as they would do again if that supervision was withdrawn.

But the freedom from payment of tolls will not make the boats charge less, for they will proceed on business principles to charge all they can get and will simply make as much more for their profit as the tolls cost would amount to.

That is the opinion of the experts, founded on most excellent reasoning, and it is almost certainly what will happen.

The experts seriously doubt if the railroads will lower their rates on coast-to-coast articles that would naturally go by water, but would let that go if necessary rather than disarrange their present organized freight rates everywhere, as would result from their lowering of the through rates.

And just as the qualified experts believe that no fewer boats will be built for the coastwise trade on account of the imposition of tolls, and no cheaper rates will be charged on account of their imposition, so do they believe that even if tolls are charged, the ultimate consumer would not have to pay more for the goods he bought, for the margin would be so small that it would be lost in the general distribution.

From no angle that can be seen by the experts does it appear that it will be to the interest of the great bulk of the people of this country to grant tolls exemption to these coastwise vessels, and there seems no sufficient reason for further enriching this monopoly at the expense of the remainder of the people, but every reason why they should pay their proportion of the expense of building and operating the canal.

But prejudice against railroads can generally be successfully invoked, and it is being used in this case for all it is worth.

I presume there is no doubt that when they had a free hand the railroads of the country charged exorbitant rates, but it should be remembered that for years they have not had that power.

They are bound hand and foot, as it were, by the various railroad commissions, interstate and State, and can neither of their volition raise rates to increase their profits or lower them to stifle competition.

I believe in the wisdom of Government supervision of railroads.

I was the chairman of the committee of the Louisiana constitutional convention of 1898 that reported favorably the ordinance creating the first railroad commission of Louisiana.

I said on the floor of that convention that in my judgment corporations that were given by the State such extraordinary privileges ought to be placed under State regulation. I have never changed that opinion, and I express it now on the floor of the United States Senate.

I believe that the men selected for commissioners of the Interstate Commerce Commission can be relied on to do justice as between the railroads and the people, not permitting the injury of the public by undue charges and not destroying the efficiency of the railroads, with whose prosperity the prosperity of the whole country is bound up, as was well said by President Wilson in a public address to the Congress, by forcing rates under which the railroads can not successfully operate.

But the old-time prejudice lingers, though the reason for it is removed, and, as I have said, the advocates of tolls exemption would like to have it appear to the country that the members of the American Congress who are opposed to such a law are dominated by railroad influence.

That might be expected of unscrupulous editors, but it should not be intimated on this floor without proof of the truth of the charge; yet as late as last Monday a Senator said in the debate on this question that—

> No fear of or hope of reward from powerful railroad corporations * * * will control my action.

This statement of negation, so far as he was concerned, is pregnant with an affirmation that the vote of other Senators on this question may be controlled by such influences; either that, or he said it with the idea that some Senators might, in consequence of this statement, be frightened off from voting against tolls exemption; but in either event it would indicate a lack of respect for his colleagues. I greatly regret that the Snator should have said this, all the more because it was not said in the heat of debate but written out deliberately in advance.

If the Senator knows of any of his colleagues who would so far forget his public duty that he is or could be influenced in his vote by any railroad influence—intrastate, interstate, or transcontinental—it is his duty to the Senate to make the fact known, so that the offending Member can be driven from the body he disgraces.

If he does not know it he should be more careful of his utterances, for we can not blame outsiders for making such charges against Senators if they are made or strongly implied by one of our own body.

I do not believe the Senator really thinks what his language indicates, but if he does he can not serve his free-tolls cause better than by giving the name or names.

The same Senator claims, as I understand, that a railroad lobby has been very much in evidence here lately working against tolls exemption.

I have seen none of these parties, nor have I heard of any of them; and if the Senator knows of this fact he should call it to the attention of the lobby investigating committee, and if he can prove his statement he will have again done good work for the tolls-exemption cause which he so ardently upholds.

The Senator says also that he knows of no shipowners who have asked for tolls exemption, and does anyone know they want tolls exemption?

Yes; it was testified before the House committee by Mr. Dearborn and others that they wanted it, but did not need it, and could get along without it.

It was testified to by them before the Senate committee in 1912 that they wanted it, and again before the same committee last month; but neither in 1912 or 1914 did a railroad representative appear before that committee protesting against tolls exemption.

The zeal of Senators for their cause should not betray them into making assertions the correctness of which can not be proved.

There is nothing disclosed by the record to prove that tolls exemption is necessary for the competition of coastwise vessels with the transcontinental railroads, or that it will cause the owners of such ships to lower their rates, or that the ultimate consumer will be benefited by tolls exemption, but very much to indicate the contrary.

So much for the transcontinental railroad hullaballoo, as I choose to call it, which will not or at least should not keep any Senator from voting on this question according to his honest convictions.

In connection with this branch of the subject, I will briefly allude to the claim made by the tolls-exemption advocates, that because on our interior rivers and canals improved by Government aid no tolls are charged our vessels, therefore none should be charged them in the Panama Canal.

I can only answer this by saying that, in my opinion, it is not possible to assimilate one of our interior rivers, carrying our interior commerce only, to a great international highway like the Panama Canal, which is really, for practical purposes, a part of the ocean, and which serves to carry the commerce of the world; and any such comparison, with all respect to those who think there is no difference in principle, seems to me to be grotesque, yet no one favors the improvement of our interior waterways more strongly than myself.

Sixth. This brings me to the last general ground of opposition to repeal, that which I may call the appeal to patriotism, one of the strongest emotions of our nature, and one that appeals to every true American; and if the premise laid down by the opponents of repeal were correct, their cause would meet with no opposition; but the trouble with the case is that their premise is not correct, but is wholly and unqualifiedly incorrect.

No American can truthfully be charged with a lack of patriotism or with a disregard of the national honor because he wishes the abolition of the tolls-exemption law; nor is it true that it would be a cowardly act or an abject surrender to the demand of a foreign power.

There is not a Senator in this body who does not know, even if he does not wish to admit it, that no sort of coercion has been threatened by any foreign power, and that none will be attempted if we refuse to repeal the tolls-exemption law.

Every one of them knows that all Great Britain has asked is a courteous request that we repeal the provision because she thinks it contravenes the treaty we made with her; or, if we are unwilling to do that, to submit the question to arbitration, as expressly provided in another treaty to cover such a disagreement.

Only this and nothing more; and every Senator knows that if we decline to accede to the request of Great Britain nothing more will be said, and the only danger we will have to fear is the danger of retaliatory commercial measures against us by the other great nations of the world and the feeling on their part that this country has not kept its plighted word.

It is idle to urge that England is the only nation that has objected to our action. England is the only nation that can formally object, for she is the only other signatory power to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

But all other nations are affected by our action and question our position, as the President said in his address to the joint session; and the fact that an isolated article may be found in a foreign law review or elsewhere indicating the opinion of the individual writer that our action does not violate the treaty can not change the fact that the world is against us on our interpretation of this question.

It is the rankest injustice to those who wish to repeal the law to charge them with lack of patriotism, and the rankest perversion of truth. I would not dream of charging anyone with conniving at national dishonor because he was unwilling to vote for repeal, believing that we had the right under the treaty to grant the exemption; but no such consideration has been shown for us who believe that the law should be repealed because we think it contravenes the treaty or is economically wrong.

The abuse and vituperation has been on their side, but I think they have seen that it was finally injuring their cause, and some of them are now declaring that we are the ones who have been hurling the abuse.

This is the case with the same Senator who spoke on 4th of May to whom I have previously alluded, who charged our side with applying offensive epithets and attributing dishonorable motives to our opponents.

Did he not see in the strongest journalistic opponent of repeal in this country, a paper sent, I think, to every Member of this body gratuitously since the tolls-exemption fight began, a column of its space headed "The Black List," and then saying these were the little presidential parasites who voted to abandon their country's rights, and that they had betrayed the Nation, and that it intended to keep these names before the public; and then followed the names of all the Representatives of all parties who had voted for repeal with black lines down their names, and at the bottom, in big black letters, the words "Turn the traitors out"?

I think all Senators saw it, but I hold it now in my hand for the inspection of any who have not seen it, and when the repeal bill has passed the Senate I presume we may expect to see the names of all Senators who voted for repeal placarded in a similar way.

There is nothing in the cry that patriotism requires us to vote against repeal, but it has served the purpose for which it was intended.

But the great body of the people of this country are being continually educated on this question, and they are not to be hoodwinked forever.

And if the fall elections go against the Democratic Party it will not be on account of the repeal of tolls exemption, but for other reasons.

The great independent press of the country is practically solid in its demand for repeal, and that is a good index of the general feeling.

The greatest papers of the Republican as well as Democratic Party are for repeal, for this is not a party question. A great majority of the people of the East and of the great Middle West are for repeal, and the South, which is supposed to so greatly profit by the operation of the canal, is practically solid for it.

Recently the resolution of a New Orleans meeting calling on the seaports of the Gulf and all the business interests of the South and of the Mississippi Valley to join in a united protest against repeal before the Senate Interoceanic Canals Committee on April 20 was filed with the committee, but not a single representative of a single business organization of a single Gulf or South Atlantic port, or any other portion of the South, except New Orleans, appeared for tolls exemption, while Pensacola appeared urging repeal; and surely the New Orleans delegation could not have been called by any resident of that city a representative business delegation.

New Orleans and the Pacific coast were in a class by themselves; and the burden of the cry of the Pacific coast people was that they wanted tolls exemption in order to better compete in the eastern markets with the lumber of the Gulf and South Atlantic States, which were thousands of miles nearer to that market than they were, thus wishing this Government aid to allow them to compete with other sections in defiance of the natural and economic laws that govern trade.

There is a stronger sentiment in Louisiana for tolls exemption than in any other Southern State, due to the extraordinary efforts of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, many people taking its assertions for proof, but the sentiment in Louisiana for repeal is very strong, and steadily growing stronger.

My days of public life will soon be over, and I do not desire to hold public office longer, and I go with pleasure to the retirement of private life, where I can enjoy the companionship of my family, of which, on account of my financial condition, I have been deprived during my official life in Washington; and I leave this great body without a single regret except that of severing the ties I have formed here with my brother Senators of all political parties, whose confidence, respect, and esteem, as evidenced by their steadfast treatment of me during my stay with them, will linger with me during the remainder of my life as one of its most fragrant memories, and which has been more prized by me than the honor of being a United States Senator, as great as that honor is.

But if I wished to be a candidate for any office again before the people of Louisiana, I would not wish to go before them on any better issue than this repeal measure; for they are both honest and intelligent, and I am sure that when the question was fully and fairly presented to them they would ratify my course on it.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WALSH. I ask now, Mr. President, unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection that action will be taken.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which was passed over, on page 18, line 13, to strike out "$80,580" and insert "$180,580: Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated, $100,000 shall be used for furnishing the primary markets in the cotton-growing States with a set of the samples as standardized by the Government, and a sample of the bleached and unbleached yarns made from the different grades, showing the waste, tensile strength, and bleaching quality thereof."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have pending a point of order against this amendment, but I understand that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was compelled to leave the city, and can not be here until Monday. I presume he desires to be here when that point of order is discussed, and therefore I ask the Senator who has the bill in charge if he is willing to let the amendment be passed over at this time?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I apprehend that we will not be able to finish the bill to-day. In that view I consent to this amendment going over, with the point of order, unless we should finish the other amendments to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator understands that I do not make that request on my own account, but on account of the absence of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GORE. I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to say that the Senator from South Carolina before he left spoke to me and requested to have that matter passed over until he could return. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], I believe, is also absent, but will be here Monday. I hope that the whole matter may go over, because, following that same matter, I have an amendment that I wish to offer to the following paragraph, and I would rather have both of them taken up at that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment stated by the Secretary in the paragraph beginning in line 9, page 18, together with the two other amendments in that paragraph, will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which was passed over is on page 23, after line 3, to strike out:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $257,000. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress, and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if the action of the committee restores the old custom of the congressional distribution of seeds?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to abolish and abandon the custom of congressional distribution of seeds.

Mr. KENYON. As the bill came from the House, then, it contained, as formerly, the provision for the congressional distribution of seeds?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the House bill carried an appropriation, I believe, of $256,000 to continue the congressional distribution of seeds.

Mr. KENYON. And the committee proposes to strike that out?

Mr. GORE. When the bill was under consideration a year ago the Senate voted to strike that appropriation from the bill—voted to discontinue the practice of congressional distribution of seeds. It was out of deference to that expressed sentiment on the part of the Senate that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry felt constrained to strike this provision from the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I think that the committee is to be commended for that action, and I hope in conference no action will be taken to restore the silly and useless custom of sending out seeds.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a year ago I voted to strike from the bill the provision for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds. I simply wish to state that if good results ever came from the distribution of seeds, I think the policy of distributing them to-day in many States is doing more good than it ever has done before, for this reason: The seeds are now distributed to the school children in all of the States of the Union, particularly those of the Middle West and West. I know this is the case in my own State, and I know that this year has shown wonderful results from the distribution of seeds among the school children of my State. They are planted by the children of nearly all the homes, in flower gardens, back yards, and in little patches where vegetables are raised; and the children have become interested in that line of work.

If it were not for that fact, I never should have said a word at this time. I believe, however, that striking out this provision is going to interfere greatly with the splendid work which has been accomplished within the last year or two.

If the Senate still thinks it is proper that these seeds should not be distributed I shall not even ask for a record vote on the item, but I thought it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to this particular phase of the distribution of our seeds.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I fully agree with what the Senator from Utah says relative to the benefits that lately have been derived from the distribution of both garden seeds and flower seeds. At the same time I do not believe sufficient benefit is derived to justify this large appropriation to be used in this way.

Of late years we have commenced work along lines of demonstrations on farms, and have made large appropriations for that purpose. In the West and South, and in many of the States in the North, we have organizations, with State agents and county agents, for the purpose of demonstrating what can be done in an agricultural way on the farms. In addition to that, we have organized a great many girls' and boys' clubs. That organization is growing greater and greater every day in my State. We commenced a little over a year ago with only a few members, and to-day we have 15,000 boys and girls in my State who are doing work in the boys' and girls' clubs.

I believe that instead of the Senators and Congressmen sending out these seeds it is better to have the distribution made directly from the Agricultural Department, and to have it done for the very splendid purpose that the Senator from Utah suggests—through the boys' and girls' clubs. Instead of making this large appropriation for promiscuous distribution, let us make a reasonable and fair appropriation for the girls' and boys' clubs of the different States and have the work done through them.

I have taken a special interest in this boys' and girls' club work in the United States, and I find that its benefits are very great and far-reaching. I hope before we finish this bill we will make some provision for the boys' and girls' clubs, especially of the Western States. Quite a number of States there have already made appropriations and in many ways raised funds to comply with the requirements of these bills, so that they can take advantage of any appropriation that we make here.

I believe the same purpose the Senator suggests can be reached through the boys' and girls' clubs and through the farm demonstration work, and that it will be more beneficial, for the reason that it will be done through channels that are well organized for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply wish to say a word about this paragraph.

I hope the action of the committee in this case means the end of the congressional distribution of seeds; and I hope the conference committee, when appointed, will not recede from the amendment made here, or at least that it will not recede from it without coming back to the Senate so that the matter can have further consideration.

I do think, however, that the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] can be made a splendid basis for an agreement in conference and that they can take care of that proposition. I think the distribution of seeds along the lines suggested there would be a splendid line of work. I think it would really accomplish great benefit and would bring about splendid results.

I should be very glad, indeed, to see a liberal appropriation made for the distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture itself to schools and organizations such as those mentioned by the Senator from Idaho. That can be arranged and done well through the Department of Agriculture and will result in very great good.

I do hope, however, that the conference committee will at least do away with the congressional distribution of seeds and provide something along the lines suggested by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought I had at my desk a number of petitions that I have received from high and district schools in my State and from students of many other schools in different parts of the State, asking that this distribution be continued. It was upon those petitions that I based the statement I made to the Senate a short time ago.

I am opposed to the present way of the distribution of seeds; but I heartily agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that when the bill goes into conference, if possible, the conferees shall agree upon some kind of an appropriation—and I should like to see it a reasonable one—authorizing the distribution of rare seeds by the Secretary of Agriculture directly to all of the public schools of the United States that may request them. If that is done, it will result, I believe, in great benefit; and I believe the limitation on the distribution will prevent the abuse, as in the past, in the promiscuous and unwarranted distribution of seeds.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, there are few questions in this world that have not two sides. I think something may be said in favor of the custom that has prevailed, and I think some criticism may be made of the custom that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] now seek to have prevail in the future.

I do not know whether or not the country has received a value equivalent to the expenditure involved in sending out these seeds. We have no method of telling whether or not we have received such value. I know one thing, however, and that is that I can take any kind of a cereal or any kind of a vegetable seed from one section of the country and plant it in another section of the country, and, as stated here by the Senator from Mississippi the other day, you always get better results in your crops, at least for a few years. If you raise the same crop from the same seed in the same section of the country, it is found to deteriorate in a short time. So this constant shifting of seeds from one section of the country to another has been most beneficial in its results.

Most of the correspondence I get from my own home State is not from the public schools in the little towns and cities. It is from the children, the boys and the girls, and the parents out in the country. They do not belong to any high-school association in the city. They have no association whatever; but they will write me that the lettuce I sent them last year worked very finely; that it was splendid, and so much better than any they had ever had before; and they will write me the same kind of letters about other things they have tried.

It may be that only a few of these people get any benefit from this distribution; but I do know that you will not get much benefit away out in the country from providing the schools in the towns with seeds to plant in their back yards and having them try to raise crops at those places. The great agricultural population of the country that will use the seeds is in the country, and those people have no organization of that kind.

I conscientiously believe that the transfer of seeds through this system has given us a value in the whole United States considerably in excess of the cost to the Government. While it may be subject to criticism in the matter of buying seeds that have not proven to be good, and so on, the general result has been beneficial. We are spending millions upon millions of dollars of the Government's funds that are not doing as much good as the distribution of these seeds is doing.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I desire to congratulate the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for the course it has taken in leaving out of the pending bill the appropriation for seeds.

When the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] commenced his remarks just now by saying that most questions have two sides, I supposed he was going to take the other side of this question. In my judgment, there never has been any excuse for the Government furnishing common, everyday garden seeds, purchasable anywhere, to the people of the country under the methods which have been followed for the last 20 years.

I do not know any agricultural community that is not opposed to following the system which has been in vogue. If the secretaries of Senators and Congressmen had devoted to some useful occupation the time which they have devoted to sending out seeds in the past, in my judgment, they would have earned more than enough money to purchase the seeds which the Government has bought and has been distributing gratis to the people of the country.

I hope the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will not be influenced by the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], seconded by other Senators here. They should insist on cutting out this whole appropriation at this time. There is no more reason why we should furnish seeds to high schools or to the children attending high schools because they use them in making gardens, than there is for our furnishing pianos to high schools or furnishing any other instruments or any other methods of development which are used in connection with the high schools of the country. If they desire to make gardens, the local appropriations should provide seeds for that purpose. By an appropriation of $50 the State of Utah could buy probably all the seeds that would be necessary for the purpose which the Senator from Utah has instanced.

I sincerely hope the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will not be influenced by such suggestions, but that we will cut out now this distribution of seeds, which has been denounced and scoffed at and laughed at by the country as long as I can remember.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, inasmuch as I think I was the only member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry who voted against striking out this provision, I wish to say a word with relation to it.

I have examined to some extent the effect of the distribution of seeds. I fully concur in what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] said with relation to the distribution of even ordinary seeds from one part of the country to the other. The results have been enormous; and it seems to me any person who has looked into the question must recognize the fact that great results have come about. Seeds from the East, when transplanted into the West, often produce a great development, even common seeds. There is no better illustration that I know of than the distribution in my State of common, ordinary cantaloupe seeds, which have produced the luscious cantaloupes known as the Rocky Ford cantaloupes. That was due simply to transplanting in a different soil. This matter of taking seed from one part of the country and transplanting it, under different conditions, in another part of the country has produced enormous benefit in the development of plants and in the development of grain.

No better development would occur, perhaps, than in the case of fruits. We all know that the peach tree has risen from what was almost a little weed, regarded as a poisonous plant, and which on account of its bitter taste was regarded as not good for anything, yet by reason of the fact that it has been transplanted and cultivated there have grown up over 500 different varieties of the most luscious fruit in the world. That has come about to a large extent by reason of transplanting seeds from one portion of the country and from one portion of the world to another. When we produce such results we can not help but think there is some benefit, at least, in the distribution.

Take the apple. The apple rose from what? The wild crab. That is what it was, and nothing else, simply growing wild; yet by reason of cultivation, and by reason of transplanting, there have grown to be over 3,500 different varieties of apples. That has come about by reason of the distribution of seeds and by transplanting seeds from one portion of the country, under certain conditions of climate, to another portion. When we consider this bagatelle of an appropriation as compared with what we appropriate in many other ways, it seems to me it is a wise appropriation and a wise policy which has been pursued by the Government for many years.

I believe transplanting the ordinary cereal from a country that raises cereals under conditions of ordinary rainfall into a country where, by reason of irrigation, there has been great development in grain, is producing wonderful benefits in the way of an immense change even in the varieties and even in the size and even in the character of the product itself.

Something has been said about a political distribution of seeds. I do not suppose there is a Senator here who ever treats the distribution of seeds as a matter of politics. The rule is that we get a list from the postmaster. We ask the postmaster to give a list of farmers in the community, and no one ever regards the question whether he is a Democrat or whether he is a Republican. The object of sending the seeds is to give them to people who want them, and the result has been that it is generally regarded as something of benefit to the person to whom they are sent, and he generally receives them with thanks.

There is one feature that I do not like about it, and that is the fact that it puts Senators to a great deal of trouble. That is true, but nevertheless it seems to me that it is worth what it costs in the way of trouble.

I am, perhaps, the only one who voted to retain this provision in the bill, and I hope it will be retained. I believe the sentiment of the Senate is almost unanimous against it, but I believe that the House of Representatives will retain it. There are good reasons and good grounds in my judgment for retaining it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the provision may not be stricken out. I have seen the benefit of seed distribution. I know it is a common saying that the seeds are good for nothing; and I had some one tell me that if swept off an old haymow and sent out they would prove to be just as good fertile seeds. Yet the fact is that the large consensus of opinion among those to whom I have sent seeds has been the other way; they have expressed themselves to me as very favorable to the fruition of the seeds so distributed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] advised me that he will be away for the day, and he requested me to ask that the unfinished business might be temporarily laid aside when it was laid before the Senate in its regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without further formality, the appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. May I be permitted to continue the few remarks I rose to make?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor, and he will proceed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Reference has been made laughingly to the fact that seeds have been sent to school children. That, in my judgment, is one of the best features of the bill. I have sent seeds to school children—scores of packages—and to the principals of schools, and I have received from the principals of schools letters stating that the seeds had inculcated a habit and a desire to nurture plants and plant life that had been infinitely valuable to the children.

I want to say as to myself that 20 or 25 years ago I received a half pint of wheat. I can not now recall from whom I received it, but I took a little patch in my garden and planted it in drills, and the fruition was great. I sowed that and kept on multiplying it until I had raised over 200 bushels of wheat that was of an entirely new variety and seemed to resist rust and was fruitful and rich in its production. I spread that quite widely. I sold it to my farmer neighbors and friends. Each one of them in turn bore testimony as to the value of the seed.

To say that there is no value and that naught comes from it except a little political favor that may come to the man who sends it is too narrow a position. We squander many millions in directions that are unwise and improvident, and I do say it is a verification of the saying that "he who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before is a benefactor of the human race."

In heaven's name I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to change his tack and rather urge the planting of garden seed as well as farm and field seed. Senators, we vote millions of money for purposes that will never bring a tithe of the blessings to our land this distribution of seeds and plants brings to this fair land.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at a former time when this subject was before the Senate I took occasion to voice my opposition to a proposal similar to that which is before us to-day. I think this is a bad place to commence economy. The appropriation is a bagatelle compared to the appropriations that we make for almost every conceivable object in our legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from New Hampshire has stated that this is a bad place in which to commence economy, and I do not know but that he is right. However, I wish some one—and the Senator has been here longer than any of us—would tell me just where the right place is for the commencement of economy. I have been trying to find it ever since I have been here, and it has been impossible so far to place it anywhere, except in the barber shop and one or two other places of similar national importance, and in the bathroom, as is suggested to me. I have not yet discovered the point where we can economize. Sometimes when we feel very poor we offer an amendment to cut down the salary of some official a few hundred dollars, or something of that sort, and also to arrange for doing away with the expense consequent upon the official telegrams of Senators. Of course, we can not commence with the battleships, because the Armor Plate Trust is behind that; we can not start with the river and harbor bill, because there are so many interested in those matters.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I must not lose the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I would be glad if the Senator could inform me where I can begin. I will quit opposing these other matters and concentrate all my energies at the point of attack.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I simply wish to suggest that we have already commenced. We no longer are to have nailbrushes, hairbrushes, or pure water for our committee rooms, or sufficient towels and sundry items in the barber shop, or the little items of supply such as medicines, remedies, and appliances for first aid to the sick and injured as we used to have. Think of the great saving, the great economy, effected in this way.

Mr. THOMAS. I have referred to that. I have wanted to economize as much as I could ever since I have been here. I think that we have set before us a good example now. I wish to know where we should begin in earnest to do something.

Mr. GALLINGER. Recalling the declaration in the Democratic national platform in favor of economy——

Mr. THOMAS. I recall that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Recalling that, I sympathize with the Senator from Colorado and his party in this matter. I think I can point out some directions in which economy might more properly be practiced, but which has apparently been overlooked.

I have forgotten how the Senator himself voted on an appropriation of $40,000,000 or thereabouts for the Government to build a railroad in Alaska. I voted against it, because I do not believe the Government ought to engage in that kind of business.

Mr. THOMAS. I voted for it. I thought it would be better for the Government to build a railroad than to give $40,000,000 to corporations up there, and I have no apology to make for that vote. Besides, I voted for a bond issue and not for an appropriation, as the bill came from the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have noticed, if I cared to take the time to enumerate them, various other matters in various other directions in which some degree of economy might have been practiced; but I am not going to enter upon that, because the Democratic Party is in power and they are responsible for the legislation. The Democratic Party can legislate on this matter of economy as it sees proper. Even though everyone of us on this side should oppose an effort to economize in governmental expenditures, the Senators on the other side can vote us down, and either become economical or extravagant as they see proper.

Therefore, Mr. President, I say that while I sympathize to a large degree with the desires of my Democratic friends to practice perhaps unreasonable economy even, I think this is a bad place to commence it. There is a little annoyance to all of us in sending out so-called congressional seeds, though it never has disturbed me very much from that point of view. I have distributed the seeds during my somewhat protracted term of service without reference to whether they went to Democrats or Republicans. Every package that was my due has been sent out, and it has reached some farmer in New Hampshire, not an agricultural State in the broad sense of the term, and has resulted, as I have observed, in very much good to the people.

It is true, as has been suggested, that the farmer can write to a man or a corporation engaged in the raising of seeds, and for 5 or 10 cents get a package or two, but the farmer does not write many letters, and the farmer does not get the seeds unless he receives them under the existing condition of things. So far as I have observed, this small appropriation—because it is but a moiety as compared with the appropriations that we are making all along the line—has resulted in better gardens for the people and in the entertainment of the children, who take an interest in the cultivation of flowers and of vegetables. That fact to my mind absolutely outweighs the appropriations for this purpose which we have heretofore made, and which the House placed in the bill as it came to the Senate.

I know, Mr. President, it is fashionable for the great newspapers of the country to scoff at this matter, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has suggested. I know that gentlemen representing great cities have very little interest in this matter comparatively. But I know, on the other hand, so far as my section of the country is concerned, and as I said before it is not an agricultural region in the broad sense, the people take a very great interest in this matter, and, in my judgment, if they had an opportunity, they would not permit this provision to be stricken from the bill.

Mr. President, I presume I am in the minority in the Senate on this question. I have been in the minority heretofore; but I want to voice my own convictions that this is a proper appropriation, that it is a wise appropriation, and I trust the suggestion which has been made by other Senators that if the provision is stricken from the bill it shall be insisted upon by the conferees on the part of the Senate may not control the committee on conference.

I can go through this bill, Mr. President, and point out appropriation after appropriation that is far less worthy than this provision. I can go through other bills that will come before us for consideration and point out where millions upon millions of dollars of the public funds are wasted in the interest of other projects than agriculture, that we might well give very careful consideration to.

Let us, Mr. President, scan carefully the river and harbor bill, which will soon be before us for consideration. Let us ask ourselves honestly whether or not many of the appropriations are wise that are in that bill. Let us ask ourselves whether a million dollars, more or less, should be appropriated for a river that might better have been improved for an automobile course, or, as a gentleman in another body suggested, might better have been insured against fire than to undertake to put water enough in it to float craft that will be of service in the commerce of the country. Let us go through all the bills that will come here; and if we really want to economize, let us economize in those matters rather than strike down this little appropriation, which, whatever may be said to the contrary, is of interest and value to the farmers of the United States.

I am not going to pose, Mr. President, as an economist, because my views are very liberal as to appropriations that concern the people of the country generally; but I do want to register my protest against a proposition that, in my judgment, strikes a blow at the interests of the farmers of this country, and which deprives the boys and girls who are interested in raising vegetables and flowers in the little patches around their homes of a great pleasure. I never shall agree to the proposition that this is an appropriation that ought to be stricken out, either here or elsewhere, or that it is doing any harm to the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I will express the hope, which I fear will not be gratified, that the Senate will not agree to striking out this appropriation; but, however that may be, I want the privilege as one Member of this body of recording my vote against striking it out.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the original idea which prompted seed distribution among the farmers was the circulation of seeds and plants imported from other countries which had not come into use and the development of which might be of material benefit to the farmer and to the country at large. In view of the fact that agriculture was crude in its beginnings in this country and the desirability of a diversity of products, Mr. Jefferson at an early date advocated this seed distribution. That reason does not now exist. The reason having ceased, the policy should cease.

The custom in vogue is to purchase seeds which are available at any seed store and distribute them among the farmers indiscriminately, without knowing what their preferences are and without knowing whether they desire them or not. The question is raised, Who is the best judge to decide whether seeds will be useful, the farmer who is to plant them or the Congressman who is to send them out from Washington?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I know the Senator wants to be right, and he is right as to a part of the apportionment of seeds; but a large amount of this money is expended in the direction the Senator first indicated, in obtaining seeds from abroad and distributing them in this country—for instance, from a country where there is dry farming, in taking dry-land seeds and sending them to a section of this country where dry farming may be productive and remunerative. In effect, it is to get the seeds by exchange or purchase and send them out to farmers and gardeners where needed.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to suggest, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, that this particular provision stricken out by the committee does not cover the point he suggests. On page 22 provisions are made that are untouched by the committee for the distribution of rare and valuable seeds from foreign countries—grasses and alfalfa—and an appropriation of about $200,000 is made therefor.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator corrected me, and I will correct him in return. There has been a large proportion of the general fund, to which he alludes, used for rare seeds, but it was believed that there was not enough of it used for certain dry-land seeds, as was the case in the last Agricultural appropriation bill, and we have provided an additional amount.

Mr. KENYON. That may be true.

Mr. WARREN. A quantity of this general appropriation may be used in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. KENYON. But there is an appropriation for the purchase of rare and valuable seeds abroad.

Mr. WARREN. A small one.

Mr. KENYON. That the amount is not sufficient is the Senator's objection?

Mr. WARREN. It is not sufficient.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the conditions in that regard are altogether different now from what they were when the policy of seed distribution was first adopted. Then it was difficult for the farmer in a region where special qualities of seed were required to obtain what was needed. Now every farmer subscribes for an agricultural journal, and the Agricultural Department, which is like a great university, sends out bulletins showing the qualities of soil which are adapted to particular seeds, and showing what kind of seeds and what plants should be used in the different localities. For instance, wheat suitable for macaroni is discovered abroad. It is brought into this country and is sold in the localities in which it can be used. Thus all the reasons which have afforded arguments for the purchase of these seeds by the Government and their distribution have practically ceased to exist.

This distribution has too much the appearance of petty graft. I am always very doubtful of any appropriation which has a multitude of beneficiaries. I am always afraid of any benefit which may be conferred upon a large number for which they have nothing to pay. You can not lay the blame upon the farmers for this appropriation, for I do not believe any considerable number of farmers desire this seed distribution.

I have through many years distributed my quota. I have sent out letters in many instances accompanying the package, and I have no doubt received quite a number of responses; but I fail to find any enthusiasm for these seeds or any strong desire to receive them. Indeed, in view of the long time in which the custom has been in vogue, it is quite surprising that requests are so few.

I regard this distribution, Mr. President, as useless, as in a measure demoralizing, and for this reason I shall vote to sustain the action of the Senate committee.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I have been entertained somewhat by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and other Senators giving their experience. What I know in connection with the seed distribution is not very favorable. Now and then the seeds we get in the extreme southern part of this country, say in south Georgia, do very well, but generally they are a failure. For instance, if we get corn from the far West and plant it in the same field, with the character of the soil the same, with corn that has been acclimated, and plant it at the same time, it is an absolute failure.

I know, too, the circumstances that used to exist before the war among the farmers in South Carolina. It was the custom there for one farmer in a remote section of the State to load a carload of seed and send it to another farmer in another section of the State, and he in turn would load a car back, and just exchange seed in the different sections; and they said it brought about a great improvement in the cotton seed. All this was confined to a State; but my experience is that where the sections are very far removed it is not profitable to plant the seed from a remote section.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the complaint he makes might well be submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture, who in this provision that is proposed to be stricken out is required to furnish seed adapted to each locality in the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Goergia [Mr. WEST], I wish to say that it is one of the most customary things in the agricultural world to exchange seed of the same kind. About every four or five years in my State we will send over to Canada and get exactly the same kind of wheat, but raised in a different section, and for a few years at least it will produce a better yield. I have had in my State this year a demand for alfalfa which has been grown by the Government. The most I could get for any one farmer was 20 pounds. I could have used in my State, having demand enough to absorb it, the entire quantity available for the entire United States.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield for an interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. Where you get wheat in North Dakota from Canada, the climatic conditions are about the same, are they not?

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. WEST. And the soil conditions?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not necessarily. As a rule, for instance, if in a dry section we would like that which was also raised more or less in a dry section of Canada. But the point I want to make is that the change in the climate of a grain for a few years is always beneficial. It is, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] indicated the other day, the same as was the effect of bringing rabbits from England into Australia, where they increased in such enormous quantities; and so it is with certain fruits, as was indicated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] in regard to melons. They brought to Colorado from different sections of the country the same kind of seed, and they have produced there, and for years will produce, even better melons than were produced where they were grown before. I am a great believer in changing the locality of the same seed; and by this method of seed distribution we are securing that result to some extent.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I illustrated that in the case from South Carolina in the exchange of cotton seed; but so far as I have been able to ascertain, in my section, where we have gotten corn from the West and planted it in the southern part of Georgia, it does not do well.

Mr. McCUMBER. Whether the distribution is through the Agricultural Department or otherwise, I know that practically all kinds of vegetables raised in my State, if we were able to grade them, raised 20 years ago have increased in character 20 per cent, or 50 per cent, probably, or over. Take the lettuce that we used to raise. It was nothing but a little green leaf. It is now crisp, and there is much more in a single head. All that has been developed in the Agricultural Department; and that is now the lettuce seed that is being sent all over the country. We can take every kind of vegetable and follow it up, and we find that that which is raised now is generally very much superior to that which was raised 15 or 20 years ago.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator, in relation to his reference to what I said that not only the planting of ordinary seed produced a great development in the line of product, such as the Rockyford cantaloupe, but when that melon is grown and the seed sent back to other portions of the country it produces a superior melon, better than could ever have been produced by simply having it raised in that locality. The mere selection of something that is produced that is better will make the farmer and make any person planting seed retain it for replanting. If it turns out to be bad, of course it will be discarded. The experiment will prove beneficial, notwithstanding it was a loss; but the fact is the farmer naturally, when he finds he has produced a superior product from a seed, retains that seed, and it is used for planting in their own particular localities.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is right. I might carry the wheat illustration just a little further. I could take bluestem wheat, for instance, from Canada, bring it down into my State, and grow it side by side with blue stem that I have been raising in the State for 5 or 10 years and produce a better crop with the same cultivation and the same rainfall. After a few years the seed will not produce any better crop. I can take that same seed again that I have used for a few years, transplant it back to Canada, and it will produce a better crop in Canada than the grain that has been raised there a few years. That is only one illustration, and I might give hundreds, where transporting seeds from different sections of the country is most beneficial.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I do not at all doubt the contention which the Senator from North Dakota makes. You can improve grain and seeds of every kind at home. Take cotton. If you select the best bolls on the best stalks, year in and year out, you can improve your own cotton. It is the same way with grain. Where the climatic conditions are the same, or where the soil is somewhat of a like character, I have not the least doubt that in transplanting these seeds and in transferring them from one section to another there is great benefit; but I do know—and I speak from experience from the use of a great many of the seeds that are sent out—that they do not do well in the South. Where they came from I do not know, but I have planted corn which I knew was transported from the West to the South which would not produce on land in the southern part of Georgia.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I rise principally for the purpose of encouraging the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am thoroughly in sympathy with him, and I hate to see him give up a battle before it has fairly been begun. I think the Senator is mistaken as to the feeling on this side of the Chamber, and if he will just show somewhat of his usual spirit in starting into a battle of this kind I think he will find reinforcements over here, which will please him when the final vote shall be taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHILTON. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not in the habit of giving up a fight until I am beaten; but from certain utterances that have been made I was rather of the opinion that I was in the minority. I did intimate that I should ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment, and I shall do so, because I wish to go on record myself. I am extremely gratified at the encouraging words uttered by the Senator from West Virginia, and I now revise the view I expressed, and say that I am of the opinion that we can beat the committee and retain this provision in the bill.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I listened to the argument when this matter was up in the Senate on a former occasion, and I have given careful attention to the argument to-day. After all that has been said in reference to the situation, it is about this: Immediately preceding this appropriation is an item, "In all, for general expenses, $2,688,455." It is quite a discriminating mind that can take all of the items which comprise that large sum and distinguish all of them in principle from this small item of $257,000. The only difference is that one has precedent and age and experience behind it, and there has not been any sufficient evidence of the failure of this experience, in my judgment, up to the present time to justify the Senate in changing the well-established rule in making these appropriations.

What does this appropriation amount to? It amounts to less than half a cent per family in the United States. We are going to take the chance of injuring the farmers, injuring a lot of poor people, injuring those who are dependent upon the Government and have become dependent upon the Government for this little help, for this encouragement; we are going to take that chance when it amounts really to less than one-half a cent to a family in the whole United States.

What is the ground on which we are doing it? The ground is that the Secretary of Agriculture is better able, is more capable, of reaching the people of the United States than are Senators and Representatives. It is a ridiculous proposition, and its mere statement shows it to be such. We all know, in fact, that it can not be true. I have long ago passed up the argument as not really worthy of being mentioned on this floor that there is any graft in this; that any Senator or Representative would seriously rely upon the distribution of seeds to help him in his race for the House of Representatives or the Senate. We all know that every Senator and every Representative pays no attention to politics in the distribution of seeds.

It is likewise untrue, Mr. President, that the people are not interested in this question of distribution. Beginning in the early spring—so has been my experience—my people write to me. The poor man out on the hillside writes to me to make a selection of seeds for him; he wants them, and relies upon them. Neither do we take the postmaster's list of those to whom we shall send seeds; we can find in every neighborhood plenty of people who want the seeds, who will experiment with them, and who rely upon getting them in a sufficient amount to exhaust the supply of each Senator and Representative.

What is the real ground against this distribution of seeds? The only reason I have heard urged against it is that the seeds are no account; in other words, we are going to stop a great humanitarian experiment that we are making, so to speak, simply because the Government can not get good seeds. The Government can get good seeds if it will try; if it will exhaust all of its resources it can get just as good seeds as can the individuals who make a business of selling seeds to the people. We can not plead our incompetence; we can not plead the ignorance of the Department of Agriculture or of any other department of this Government as a reason why we should stop now, after twenty-odd years of experiment, this plan of distributing seeds to the people.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that we are commencing our work of economy at the wrong end. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States is going to make this experiment, certainly not for the reasons that have been urged upon this floor or upon any other occasion, that I am aware of.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think I ought to say that the pending bill carries an appropriation of $166,500 for the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds. It also carries an appropriation of $74,600 for the investigation, introduction, and distribution of foreign plants and seeds. The pending amendment is leveled at seeds which would be considered as neither rare nor valuable.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from Oklahoma is mistaken in his statement. I have looked at the provision, and what I said was not said carelessly. If the Senator will look on page 22, he will find these words:

> For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds—

That is not all; the provision does not stop there, but continues—> and for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops, $166,500.

Then there is this proviso:

> Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $100,000 may be used for the purchase and distribution of such new and rare seeds.

Grasses, alfalfa, clover, and forage crops are not rare, and could not hide behind the words, "new and rare seeds."

Mr. GORE. They are not rare and valuable seeds.

Mr. CHILTON. They are not. In other words, by adopting the amendment we would be making a discrimination, and we could not justify the appropriation of $166,500 on the ground that it is, as the Senator from Ohio said, for experimenting as to "rare seeds," and cut out the $257,000 on the argument that the latter can be thus distinguished. I deny that there is any politics or thought of politics in my position. There has not been presented any sufficient reason for changing our present system of distributing seeds. I am not willing, for the reasons given, to deprive my people of what I conceive to be a substantial benefit.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, under the language of the bill $66,500 is supposed to be used for administrative purposes and for the testing and experimentation with these plants, and $100,000 would be directly available for the distribution of the seeds. A policy of that sort might get us somewhere; it might lead to the introduction and dissemination of seeds that would be really valuable, but the seeds which are purchased and distributed under the clause which is proposed to be stricken out by the pending amendment, are neither rare nor valuable. They get us nowhere; they have to be distributed each and every year. That was the feeling of the committee in regard to the appropriation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Oklahoma has just stated that the seeds provided for in the clause which it is sought to strike out were neither rare nor valuable. The language of the bill is for the purchase——

Mr. GORE. I am aware of the language of the bill, but I was stating the practice which usually prevails. It is true that each Senator can commute these seeds and get any particular kind of seeds he desires; but in small quantities it is not really worth while or worthy of attention to do so.

Mr. POMERENE. What I desired to call attention to was the fact that the language is "valuable seeds."

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir. Of course, I did not mean to state that they were absolutely valueless, but I intended to use the expression in the larger sense of scientific or improved agriculture or horticulture. Of course, seeds cost a little something, and anything that costs anything has value in a technical sense; but I may say that the real motive which actuated the committee was this. The Senate by an overwhelming majority last year decided to cut out this appropriation from the agricultural appropriation bill. I believe the sentiment was so overwhelming that the yeas and nays were not even demanded. The committee felt that it ought to be governed by that authoritative expression of the sense of the Senate. We also indulged the illusory hope that by striking out this provision in committee we should avoid a protracted, if not an illuminating, discussion upon this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not oppose the proposition of striking out the paragraph so far as it relates to common garden seeds. I believe that it is an expensive proposition not only in furnishing the seeds, but it is burdening the mails; it is costing the Government of the United States a great amount of money not only for the purchase of the seeds, but to carry the seeds in the mails.

I am a firm believer in the appropriation of a sum of money sufficient to permit the Agricultural Department to experiment with rare seeds, and after that department has made those experiments, to have a sufficient amount of money to distribute them over the United States. I do not believe, however, that we should insist upon the continuance of this old custom of sending out common garden seeds.

It is true, especially is it true in the newer States, that settlers on the public lands, for instance, appreciate a package of garden seed. Many of them in the western part of my State, or where the settlements have recently been made, write me for garden seed; but I can see no good reason why we should appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars simply because a few people are anxious to get common garden seed for nothing.

Mr. President, I believe that we could make better use of this money if we increased the appropriation for rare and valuable seeds, and then permitted the Secretary of Agriculture to send such seeds directly to the people. I was not present when the discussion came up on this paragraph in the committee, and I have not heretofore heard the paragraph discussed. It is true, however, that a great many of these seeds that are sent out by the Agricultural Department are practically of no value, not because they are inferior seeds, but because they are seeds grown in a certain climate, say in a warm climate, and then sent to a cold climate. Under such circumstances seeds are absolutely valueless.

Anyone who has any practical knowledge of growing seeds or plants must know that to get perfect results the seed must be sown under the same climatic conditions and in similar soil.

Take grim alfalfa, for instance. Grim alfalfa was discovered by the Agricultural Department away over in Siberia. I have sent out to my State 188 portions of that grim alfalfa, but not a single portion has gone to the Red River Valley. Why? Because in the Red River Valley they have an abundance of rain, while grim alfalfa is a drought-resistant plant. I, therefore, sent it to the western portions of my State, which are classed as among the semiarid regions of the West. Seeds grown in a warm climate and in a certain kind of soil are not adapted to a far-away country where the climatic and soil conditions are different.

Mr. President, I had not intended to take any time in discussing this provision. I shall make no objection to striking it out, and the committee has recommended that it be stricken out; but I am not in favor of reducing the appropriation that can be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in buying rare and valuable seeds. If I had my way, Mr. President, I would increase the appropriation in the paragraph on page 22 which provides:

For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds, and for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover and other forage crops, $166,500: Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $100,000 may be used for the purchase and distribution of such new and rare seeds.

That amount ought to be increased to at least $266,000, of which $200,000 should be available for the distribution of rare seeds to the farmers of the United States.

You will find clovers suitable for Oklahoma that are absolutely worthless in North Dakota. Take again the grim alfalfa, which was sent out by the Agricultural Department to the semiarid and to the arid regions of the West. That variety of alfalfa, although well adapted to the arid and the semiarid regions, is absolutely valueless in the South, and in every instance where drought-resistant seeds, which should be sent to the arid or semiarid regions of the North and Northwest, are sent to the South it is money thrown away.

Mr. President, I believe the chairman of the committee ought to accept an amendment to the paragraph on page 22, which I have just read, to increase the amount to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in the purchase and distribution of rare and valuable seeds. We ought to appropriate $300,000, or at least $266,000, for such rare and valuable seeds, allowing the department to use $66,000 for the propagation of the seeds and then $200,000 for their distribution.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is the most practical farmer in this body, as well as the most distinguished. I am glad that he does not feel insulted or injured by the proposition to cut out free seeds. I feel, Mr. President, that this battle is hopeless, as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] has assured the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that if the Senator from New Hampshire will simply put on his fighting clothes the forces of free seed can win. In that mighty union I fear this matter will be defeated. I am sufficiently acquainted with the fighting ability of the Senator from New Hampshire to know that our cause now is nearly hopeless. Free trade, free silver, and free tolls have all been mighty shibboleths, and I am afraid we can not defeat free seeds. Anything free is elusive and seductive.

I made an investigation last year of the expense to this Government involved in the free distribution of seed. Let me say now that I am not speaking against the proposition of sending out valuable seeds and grasses and valuable plants, such as Senators have spoken of; but this action of the committee is directed against political seeds, and that is all they are. I have not the figures here which were obtained as the result of the investigation I made, but taking into account the burden on the mail service, the Postmaster General——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. KENYON. In just a moment; I should like to finish the sentence. The Postmaster General pointed out, some years ago, some of the reasons for the deficit in the Post Office Department; and one of the reasons was the expense of the free-seed distribution. I understand also that various Secretaries of Agriculture have suggested the elimination of this provision. Taking that into consideration, my investigation showed that we had spent in four years practically a million dollars to carry on this matter. If we are ever going to commence on economy, it seems to me that here is a good time to commence. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator has repeated what one other Senator uttered a moment ago, that this was a political matter. I do not know what other Senators do or what Members of another body do in the matter of distributing seeds, but it never occurred to me that a Democrat or a Progressive or a Prohibitionist was not as much entitled to his share of the seeds which are distributed as is a Republican; and I know that in my State they have gone to farmers absolutely without any reference to their political feelings. I think we ought to eliminate that feature from the discussion, because I do not believe any Member of this body or of the other body ever differentiates in the distribution of this bounty of the Government to the farmers so as to deprive his political opponents from getting as much consideration as his political friends. I think that must be so.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is entirely true, Mr. President. The seeds are not sent to Republicans by Republicans or to Democrats by Democrats or to Prohibitionists by Prohibitionists; the bounty falls equally on all. I suggest, however, that it would be far better if we would use this appropriation to disseminate among our people some of the delightful maple sugar that comes from New Hampshire. I think it would do them vastly more good——

Mr. GALLINGER. I appreciate that.

Mr. KENYON. Which the Senator now so kindly distributes freely among his senatorial friends.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the Senator said a few moments ago that in the last four years it has cost a million dollars to distribute seeds. Do I understand that amount to be in addition to the original appropriations, or that it includes the annual appropriations?

Mr. KENYON. I mean including everything in what we call the congressional seed distribution. It costs the Government that much money—buying the seed, packing the seed, and transporting the seed through the mails.

Mr. BRADY. But this appropriation in this paragraph alone calls for $257,000.

Mr. KENYON. I think the appropriation has not been as high in past years, although I am not certain as to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been increased of late years.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator thinks, on the average, the Government has spent about $250,000 a year?

Mr. GALLINGER. The appropriation was doubled a few years ago.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to say as to the political aspect——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WEST. Does not the Senator think that the seeds would be more widely distributed by the Agricultural Department than by a representative of the people sending out at random the seed that is apportioned to him?

Mr. KENYON. I certainly do. Mr. President, there is another view of this matter. This system is unfair; it is a discrimination against the man who is not in office but who is running for office. The man who is in office has his 20,000 packages of seeds, and he sends those packages out under the frank of the Government. People are highly delighted and highly honored to get an envelope with the name of a Senator or Representative in the corner. If they get those and do not plant them before the primary or before the election, the man who has sent out the seeds has a great advantage over his opponent. If they plant them, however, and they grow before election, he is at no advantage over his opponent. The Government might just as well appropriate money to send out cheap cigars to the electors of this country; the principle would be just the same. It would give the man in office——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. Just a moment. I want to finish this illustration. It would give the man in office an advantage provided the cigars were received the night before election and not used until after the election was over. But if used before the election he would be at no advantage. But there would be just as much sense in that proposition as there is in free distribution of seeds.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I can hardly consent to the proposition that the Senator was elected over his opponent by reason of the fact that he had certain seed advantages. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENYON. I do not grasp the humor in the Senator's remark; but, as for my part, I send out none of the seed.

Mr. President, there is just as much——

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask if the Senator has disposed of his quota to another Senator?

Mr. KENYON. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. Has the Senator disposed of his quota of seeds?

Mr. KENYON. I will turn a portion of my quota over to the Senator from West Virginia, who is the great champion of the cause of free seeds.

Mr. CHILTON. I will say, Mr. President, that I could use them to good advantage. I would certainly send them to some Progressives, some Republicans, and some Democrats; and I can assure the Senator that there is not, within my knowledge, a voter in West Virginia who ever has been or who could be influenced by such a bagatelle as a package of seeds, nor do I believe it of the Senator's people in Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I think the farmers of my State resent it as a cheap method of currying favor at the expense of the Government. You might just as well, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, send a piano out; you might just as well send grape juice out to instruct the youth of the country as to the beneficial use of grape juice. It would accomplish just as much good and possibly more as sending out free seeds. What I am objecting to, Mr. President, is the useless extravagance of this practice, and I will join with the Senator from New Hampshire as to the river and harbor bill, which I believe is generally iniquitous——

Mr. GALLINGER. Or the public-buildings bill.

Mr. KENYON. And the public-buildings bill, and all these other matters; and then try to cut down the expense of this Government to some reasonable basis.

All I meant to do, however, was to put into the RECORD this statement as to expense. I imagine this amendment will be defeated. As the Senator from West Virginia has suggested, this battle will go on; and the seed battle, once begun, is never left until it is won.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I wish to say a word relative to the section commencing on line 17, and my reasons for believing that that will be more beneficial than it would be for us to leave in the bill the section for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds.

The provision commencing on line 17, page 22, reads:

> For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds, and for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops, $166,500: Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $100,000 may be used for the purchase and distribution of such new and rare seeds.

I take it that the term "new and rare seeds" does not mean new and rare seeds in this country, but new and rare seeds in the community to which they are to be sent, and in which they are received. As was correctly said by the Senator from North Dakota, who is a practical farmer, it certainly will not do any good to send seeds from one climate to another where the climatic conditions are not somewhat similar. In other words, it will not do at all to take corn raised in a high altitude on arid lands, where the corn is produced by artificial moisture, such as irrigation, and send it down to Georgia, for it will not grow there. That fact has been established very clearly.

My thought is that even this small appropriation of $166,500, of which $100,000 is to be used for the purchase and distribution of new and rare seeds, will be more beneficial to the farmers of this country than $257,000 used through congressional distribution.

The Senators and Representatives, as a general thing, do not have the time to give attention to this matter; and I believe that those who do have the time to give it attention are not working any more for the interest of the farmer than they are for themselves, for they do not have time to investigate the proper distribution of the seeds. The packages are made up of a stated number of different varieties, and seeds may be sent to one man or one family that would not or could not be beneficial to them at all.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRADY. I do.

Mr. LANE. I wish to make the suggestion that I do not care whether this item is kept in the bill or not; but last year I distributed nearly all of my quota of seeds to the county school superintendents, and induced them to take charge of distributing them among the children in the rural schools all over the State. They had gotten up a sort of a contest among themselves for prizes. That disposed of the matter easily, and I really think a good use was made of the seed distribution.

Mr. BRADY. I think the suggestion is a splendid one. However, I believe that can be done much better by the Secretary of Agriculture, who has a department that can handle this very thing, than by a Member of the House or a Member of the Senate.

I have the same quota of seeds to distribute as other Senators. I have followed the plan of writing to the postmasters and different farmers' organizations and asking them for a list of names. I gave no thought whatever to the question whether they were Democrats, Republicans, Progressives, or Socialists. All I wanted to know was that they were farmers and that they desired the seeds.

I believe that the better plan, even better than that suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] or the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], will be to have the distribution handled not only through the schools but through the boys' and girls' clubs of the State. The boys' and girls' clubs are formed for the purpose of agriculture and for the purpose of demonstrating what can be done with a certain allotment of land.

In conducting the boys' and girls' club work in our State we set aside an acre that we allowed to be farmed by a boy or girl for the purpose of seeing how much wheat they can raise on that amount of ground, an acre for corn, and half an acre for sugar beets, and other crops that may be assigned to them. The boy or girl who is a member of the club takes that acre or half acre, or whatever amount it is, and cultivates it in the best possible way. They generally receive a prize; in fact, they always receive a prize for the best acre or the best production on a less amount of ground that they cultivate.

The way to have this seed reach the farmer is through a definite organization, which, in my judgment, should be primarily that of the State. The State should have control of the distribution in reality, but it should always be in close touch with the Agricultural Department of our Government, so that the information that the Government secures by testing the seeds can go on down through the channel of these clubs or schools to the man on the farm. That is where we desire to have the information finally go, and where the benefits primarily must be derived if we are going to succeed.

My reason for supporting the amendment striking out the section as it appears in the bill, is not for any political purpose. I am not one of those who believe that men who distribute seeds or do different things of that kind do so with ulterior motives. I believe they do it because they believe it is for the best interests of their constituents. My only reason for favoring the striking out of this section is because I believe you can take $166,500 for the purposes named in the section on line 17, page 22, use $100,000 of it for the distribution of seeds, and secure better results than you can by having $257,000 in the bill for promiscuous distribution.

I am very much in favor of increasing from $100,000 to $200,000 the amount on line 21, that may be used for the purchase and distribution of new and rare seeds. I do not think there is a Senator in the Chamber at this moment who does not realize that the Agricultural Department certainly can secure better results with that amount than it possibly can do in any other way. For that reason I favor striking out the section.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, on account of the absence of Senators who necessarily had to have lunch, and so forth, I suggest the absence of a quorum, in order that they may be able to reach here in time to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, before the roll call begins, I wish to ask the Senator not to do that, because——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that the suggestion of the absence of a quorum already has been made, and the Chair thinks it probably can not be withdrawn.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Kansas can withdraw it. I wish to say to him that one bell will bring more Senators into the Chamber than two bells, so that there is no economy of time in calling for a quorum.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that a number of Senators have told me they had to leave to attend to necessary business, and they are in the Senate Office Building. A single call does not give them time to reach here in order to vote. I am doing this at their request.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if the provision on page 22, relating to the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds, has been disposed of.

Mr. GORE. That paragraph has been agreed to. In fact the committee reported no amendment on the subject, and it has been agreed to, as far as the Committee of the Whole is concerned. I might suggest to the Senator that when we finish the consideration of the committee amendments any amendment he desires to offer will at that time be in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I was just going to suggest that we finish the subject of seeds, and I ask permission of the chairman to offer an amendment.

Mr. GORE. I desire to say that I have agreed with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to call up for consideration the amendment relating to migratory birds. The Senator from Connecticut desires to be absent on Monday and Tuesday next. I therefore would request the Senator from North Dakota to defer the presentation of his amendment at this time.

Mr. GRONNA. I should be very glad to do so, but I expect to be absent, and I should like to have it disposed of now. I do not believe that it will take more than a minute. I shall not ask for a record vote, I will say to the Senator. I simply want to consider the particular provision at this time.

Mr. GORE. I may say to the Senator that the amendment which the Senator intends to propose, I understand, has not been estimated for; it would be subject to a point of order, and I shall feel constrained to make a point of order against any amendment of that character exceeding the amount estimated by the department. But at this juncture I feel obliged to insist upon the consideration of the migratory-bird amendment, in order that several Senators may be heard on that subject who will be away on Monday and Tuesday next. Does the Senator expect to be away on Monday and Tuesday next?

Mr. GRONNA. I am not quite sure that I will be here. I was simply going to suggest that we consider the provision, and I wanted permission to offer an amendment to increase the amount from $166,500 to $266,500.

Mr. GORE. I shall be obliged to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, with that statement, as the amendment is clearly subject to a point of order, not having been estimated for, I shall not press it; but I was in hopes that after we had eliminated the item of $257,000, the amount for the propagation and distribution of rare and valuable seeds could be increased $100,000. Of course, if the chairman of the committee insists on making a point of order it would be of no use for me to propose the amendment, because I take it that it would go out on a point of order.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment on page 53, line 22, reducing the appropriation relative to migratory birds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 53, beginning at line 17, the paragraph reads as follows:

For all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., pp. 847, 848), relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, $50,000.

The Senate committee proposes to strike out $50,000 and to insert in lieu $10,000.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I ask that this amendment be not agreed to. I do not care to discuss the question unless it is necessary. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, in his estimate, requested an appropriation of $100,000. That estimate was cut down in the House to $50,000, and the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate has reduced it to $10,000.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that two months ago the Senate, without a dissenting vote, adopted a resolution requesting the President to negotiate treaties with foreign nations for the protection of useful birds. A treaty has been prepared in our State Department and approved by the Secretary of State and by the President and forwarded by the British ambassador to his Government for its approval. There is every reason to expect that this treaty will be returned to the Senate for ratification at an early day. I also think there is every reason to expect that the treaty will be ratified, inasmuch as the treaty is coming here at the request of the Senate. I think it unsafe to assume that the Senate will repudiate and disown its own offspring.

The effect of adopting the amendment as reported by the Senate committee and of reducing the appropriation to $10,000 will be tantamount to a declaration that this Government does not intend to enforce the law. It seems to me it would be a most unwise proceeding, at this juncture especially, because of the effect it might have upon the British Government while considering the treaty.

I do not care to say anything more unless there is argument made in opposition to my position; and, Mr. President, I hope when the vote is taken that it will be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the item now under consideration relates to the act of March 4, 1913, declaring all migratory game and insectivorous birds which do not remain permanently within any State to be under the protection of the Federal Government, and forbidding the killing of the same contrary to the regulations made by the Department of Agriculture fixing closed seasons. The act made it unlawful to kill or capture migratory birds within the closed season, and provided as the penalty a fine of not more than $100 or imprisonment not more than 30 days, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The original act of 1913 appropriated $10,000 for the enforcement of the so-called migratory-bird law. The department proceeded under the act to make rules and regulations prescribing closed seasons for the killing of migratory and insectivorous birds in the various States. Violations of these regulations are punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both. These rules and regulations may be changed from time to time upon application to the Secretary of Agriculture, so that what the act actually does is to give to the Secretary of Agriculture power to prescribe rules and regulations, violations of which are made criminal. Under this act the department has prescribed closed seasons in conflict with the laws of the several States.

The bill under consideration passed the House carrying an appropriation of $50,000 for the enforcement of this act, and the department is providing for the employment of a clerical force under the civil service in connection with the statute.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture, believing that the act is unconstitutional and will be so held when tested, reduced the appropriation to $10,000, with a view to having the validity of the act determined.

Ardent advocates of the measure have challenged this action as unfair. They insist that the appropriation of at least $100,000 should be made, and have severely criticized the action of the Senate committee in reducing the appropriation as an unwarranted effort to discredit the law.

Believing that the course pursued by the Senate committee is justifiable and proper, I feel it my duty to present briefly some of the reasons for this conclusion. There is no occasion for intemperate utterances regarding the subject. If the measure is clearly unconstitutional, it is absurd to organize a large force and appropriate any considerable sum of money for the enforcement of the act. Whenever it is tested it will be held invalid. Doubt as to the validity of the act did not originate with the Committee on Agriculture. It was frankly expressed by the author of the bill in his speech on January 14, 1913, in this body in the following language:

Mr. McLEAN. I frankly said that I did not myself find authority for it in any express clause of the Constitution, but I thought it was one of the implied attributes of sovereignty, based upon the incompetency of any State to accomplish the results desired, and that it is absolutely necessary that any nation worthy of the name shall have this power; and I cited instances of treaties and conventions between European nations. They have there a very complete code for the protection of game birds, and my hope is that the nations of the Western Hemisphere will, when the United States sets the example, quickly follow it.

The Senator will admit that a great many things have been decided as constitutional for which our fathers, at least, found no special constitutional grant, and that is my position. I agree it is fallow ground, and I cited but one case in which the Supreme Court clearly intimated that it was a dormant right that the Nation has a right to exert any time it chooses.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] on that occasion impliedly expressed his disbelief in the constitutionality of the measure by offering a resolution calling upon the President to propose a treaty with the governments of other North American countries for the mutual protection of migratory birds. Concerning this resolution at the time of offering it, he made the following statement:

Mr. ROOT. I think, sir, that that—

Referring to the resolution—

I think, sir, that that may furnish a pathway along which we can proceed to some practical relief in regard to the very urgent and pressing evil which the Senator from Connecticut has described. We already have a treaty regarding migratory fish in the Great Lakes and in that system of waters, and it may be that under the treaty-making power a situation can be created in which the Government of the United States will have constitutional authority to deal with this subject. At all events, that is worthy of careful consideration, and for that purpose I open it by the offer of this resolution.

During the course of the address in the Senate by the author of the bill other Senators, including the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], expressed the opinion that the act was unconstitutional, and, if I read the RECORD correctly, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] also had grave doubts as to the power of Congress to rightfully pass the measure.

On January 22, 1913, the bill was passed by unanimous consent and practically without discussion, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], however, making a brief statement, from which I quote the following:

Mr. MCLEAN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for a moment only. I gave notice last week that I would this morning call the attention of the Senate to S. 6497, a bill to protect migratory game and insectivorous birds in the United States, with the hope of securing the consent of the Senate to a vote upon the bill in the near future. I think perhaps I ought to say that at the time the bill was reported in April last I was advised by the friends of the measure not to press for a vote during the first part of the Sixty-second Congress. It seemed to me to be good advice then, and I hope I shall not have occasion to change that opinion. But under the circumstances, Mr. President, inasmuch as the method of conducting the business of the Senate has reached that stage of refinement where it is utterly impossible to secure affirmative legislation without the consent of every Member of the body, there is nothing for me to do but appeal to the Senate to consent to a vote upon this bill.

After that speech, and a slight short additional statement, the bill was passed without further discussion at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ROBINSON. I take pleasure in yielding.

Mr. GALLINGER. My memory may be at fault, but it is my impression that during the discussion on the bill I myself made a few feeble remarks in favor of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. No. The Senator from New Hampshire did make some remarks at the time of the speech made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], a few days prior to the time when the bill was passed; and it was passed as a great many other measures are—by unanimous consent, practically without consideration. I do not mean to imply that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] did not fully discuss the measure in his speech several days prior thereto; and during the course of that speech the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] did make some remarks, which I have no doubt added greatly to the illumination of the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly not; but my recollection is that the Senator from Connecticut debated the bill at considerable length on some occasion. It may not have been the day the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated that on the 13th of January the Senator from Connecticut made a speech; and during the course of his very able discussion of the subject the Senator from New Hampshire did make some remarks; but the bill was afterwards called up and considered and passed on January 22, 1913, by unanimous consent without any discussion whatever, except a statement from the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the principal part of which statement I have quoted in this discussion.

Mr. GALLINGER. And, if the Senator will permit me, the Senator will recall the fact that in the other House, after debate, there were only 15 votes cast against the bill. The vote was almost unanimous there as well as here.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to reply to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire first. I do not think that fact, if it be a fact, is of controlling consideration. It is not material by what majority the bill passed.

I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to ask a question for information. The bill to which reference has been made, which passed the Senate by unanimous consent, passed the House?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. Otherwise it could not have become a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. It passed the House with 15 dissenting votes.

Mr. BURTON. The appropriation suggested in the pending bill is based upon the provision in the agricultural appropriation act of last year. Was the provision in the bill passed in the House and Senate repeated and carried into that agricultural bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think not. My information is that the act itself of March 4, 1913—the so-called migratory-bird law—carried an appropriation of $10,000, and if my memory is correct the agricultural appropriation act of last year carried no appropriation for the enforcement of that act.

Mr. BURTON. The language of the bill as passed was carried into the agricultural appropriation bill, was it not?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think so.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I simply wanted to confirm the recollection of the Senator from New Hampshire about the bill passing the House. It did pass the House of Representatives after considerable discussion, and as the result of a yea-and-nay vote. I have not the vote before me, but there was a considerable majority in favor of its passage.

Mr. GALLINGER. There were 15 votes against it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course every Senator knows that a bill before it becomes a law must pass both Houses of Congress, and it is immaterial by what majority it passes if it passes by any majority at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if in the debate in the House anyone suggested upon what clause of the Constitution the bill could be made constitutional.

Mr. WEEKS. There was a time limit on the debate, and that question was not very generally discussed, but there was no question that there was doubt in the minds of some Members of the House as to the constitutional authority to pass the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, Mr. President, I will resume.

On November 5, 1913, Attorney General Carmody, of the State of New York, issued an opinion to the conservation commission of that State discussing the act in detail and declaring it invalid. The Department of Agriculture, it appears to me, has sought to avoid testing the constitutionality of the measure. The Secretary of Agriculture, while in thorough sympathy with the purposes of the act, indicates that he does not believe it constitutional. On April 22, 1914, I addressed to him the following letter:

APRIL 22, 1914.

Hon. DAVID F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Your attention is called to the fact that the Senate Committee on Agriculture, having under consideration the agricultural appropriation bill, reduced the appropriation for the enforcement of the so-called "migratory-bird law" to $10,000, with the understanding that the department would as speedily as possible test the validity and constitutionality of the measure. I presume that the chairman of the committee has, or will, communicate with you regarding this matter. It has recently been suggested, however, that the legal features of this measure are under the control of the Department of Justice. I would be pleased to know what the facts are as to this and what action has heretofore been taken, if any, and what decisions have been made by the courts touching the constitutionality or validity of this measure. The attitude of the Senate committee is that it is not advisable to create a large force and incur great expense in the enforcement of this measure, its constitutionality being in very great doubt.

Very truly, yours,

JOE T. ROBINSON.

To this letter he promptly replied under date of April 24, 1914, as follows:

APRIL 24, 1914.

Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: I have your letter of April 22, in reference to the migratory-bird law. I think this a most beneficent law and that it would be a misfortune if it were repealed, declared invalid, or not enforced. I appreciate the thought in the minds of the committee that the law may be declared invalid and that it would be embarrassing to have a large number of individuals employed who would be dropped with consequent hardship.

I referred to this matter recently when I was before the Senate committee and expressed appreciation of the difficulty, but also stated that, in my judgment, it would be desirable to have a larger appropriation than $10,000.

In that connection the chairman of the committee stated that the Secretary of Agriculture claimed that $20.000 would be entirely adequate for the purposes of the department in the enforcement of this measure.

We could use a larger appropriation without creating a staff so large that we could not take care of it in case the law was declared invalid. I think it would be a mistake not to have a reasonable enforcement of the law, so long as it is on the statute books, and I hope it will continue to stay on the statute books.

You have been correctly informed as to the legal phases of the matter. The prosecution of cases arising under the law is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. So far no case has been presented to this department which our solicitor has deemed it advisable to present to the Department of Justice. I can not say when such a case will be found. A number of violations of the act have been prosecuted, however, in various States in which the defendants have pleaded guilty, but these cases have not come to this department or afforded an opportunity for a test of the law. In January last the State game warden of Oregon reported to the United States attorney for that district a violation of the law. An information was filed by the United States attorney on January 7. The defendant pleaded guilty and was fined $10. Four prosecutions for violation of this law have occurred in the northern district of California, which resulted, within the past three months, in pleas of guilty and the imposition of fines. These prosecutions were instituted by the United States attorney cooperating with the game and fish commissioners of the State of California. Five prosecutions in the eastern and western districts of Arkansas in the past three months have resulted in pleas of guilty and the imposition of fines. Another prosecution is now pending in Arkansas.

The department is just in receipt of a newspaper clipping from the Argus-Leader, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., dated April 18, 1914, containing a report of the conviction of one Alfred M. Shaw for violation of the migratory-bird law. Shaw's attorney objected to the indictment on the ground that the law was unconstitutional. The court overruled the objection, the defendant pleaded guilty, and was fined $100.

The department itself, so far, has not reported a case to the Attorney General, but has investigated numerous alleged violations, and in every case has found that the facts did not warrant indictments.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. I know nothing about the law which is being discussed here. Upon what ground is the unconstitutionality of the law based?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am going to discuss that right now.

Mr. WEST. All right.

Mr. ROBINSON. The attorney general of the State of New York, in his opinion, I believe, in the main, clearly sets forth the true doctrine governing the subject. I quote from that opinion:

This statute clearly announces the doctrine of Federal control of migratory birds within the borders of any State or Territory upon its face. To this extent it is a plain violation of the sovereign power vested in the respective States, and heretofore unquestioned on the part of the Federal Government. No decision can be found either of the Federal courts or of State courts of any recognized import that supports a Federal right of property in migratory game such as is claimed in this act. To this extent the question is new, but by analogy it is, to my mind, a well-settled question.

The property right of individuals in wild animals has been from the earliest cases at common law defined as a common right to pursue them, when the sovereign State permits, and a qualified property in their bodies when captured or killed. Conversely, the absolute authority of a State, using its police power and acting as trustee for the people of the State at large, to thus superimpose as between itself and individual limitations upon the right to pursue and possess game has been long past contention. (Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S., 519; Silz v. Hesterburg, 211 U. S., 31.)

It is elementary that the Federal Government is one of delegated powers; that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people" (Art. X, amendments of the Constitution); and that "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." (Art. IX, amendments of the Constitution.)

Attorney General Carmody, of New York, in discussing this feature of the subject, stated as follows:

If the Federal Government has the power to legislate in regard to migratory birds while within the territory of a State or Territory, we should be able to find the source of this power in the Federal Constitution itself. If it is not there it does not exist. I am at a loss to discover any provision in the Federal Constitution that supports this assumed power. It is claimed, I understand, by the patrons of this bill that the act is based upon section 8 of Article I, which gives to Congress power to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. Migratory birds, they say, destroy insects harmful to crops and vegetation. If Federal control of matters ordinarily under State jurisdiction could be based upon such reasoning as this, then there is no function of the State government that can not be superseded by Federal control. Just as well could you extend upon this authority Federal control over divorces, over matters of public health generally, over crimes, over the subject of extradition. Indeed, it is hard to place a limit to the exercise of such power if you recognize its existence.

Mr. President, it was upon the general-welfare clause of the Constitution that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] impliedly, in that portion of his speech which I have already read, based the power of the Federal Government to legislate upon this subject. It seems to me to be the accepted doctrine that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution can not be construed to give any specific power or any power which some one may think necessary to be exercised by the Federal Government. In order to set at rest that contention, I will quote from a recognized authority on constitutional law, one whose commentaries have become textbooks in the law schools and universities of the country. Says Mr. Story:

The preamble never can be resorted to to enlarge the powers conferred on the General Government or any of its departments. It can not confer any power per se. It can never amount by implication to an enlargement of any power expressly given. It can never be the legitimate source of any implied power when otherwise withdrawn from the Constitution. Its true office is to expound the nature and extent and application of the powers actually conferred by the Constitution and not substantively to create them.

It does not seem to me, therefore, that the act can be sustained on the theory that the Federal Government can deal with the subject more adequately than can the States, and, therefore, has the implied power inherent in its sovereignty, as stated by the Senator from Connecticut, to pass such legislation. Discussing this subject Attorney General Carmody, in his opinion, said in part:

The assumption that the power being one within the scope of governmental authority is within the United States and denied the States, for the reason that the States have no extra-territorial jurisdiction and will not act uniformly, is unavailing in the face of the decisions of our courts that the protection of all game has been from earliest time a State police power. We have no sanction to shift the subject to one of incompetency or noncooperative action on the part of the States, nor to justify the statute on the ground that the laws of one State may seriously affect citizens of other States, for under such an argument Congress would have had power over commerce and bankruptcies.

No necessity for a broad power in Congress can create it. The "pressure of a supposed general welfare" can not constitute Congress the legislative arbiter of all interstate troubles or of all affairs over which State laws fail through inadequacy. As the court makes clear in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46, p. 90):

"The framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act."

The conclusion of the attorney general of New York is:

I conclude that this law is an unwarranted invasion by the Federal Government of a power that belongs, under the Federal Constitution, to the State exclusively. It is paternalistic in character and entirely inconsistent with the theory upon which is regulated the relative functions of State and Federal powers. It is not to be found either in express terms or implication in the Federal Constitution. It is contrary to a long and unbroken line of decisions of Federal and State courts. It is true that the law contains a provision that it shall be construed in harmony with the local laws of States for the protection of nonmigratory birds. Were the principle of the law reconcilable with this declaration, or were the terms of the law placed in harmony with the State law, there would be no occasion for this opinion. The fact is, however, that notwithstanding this declaration that the provisions of the Federal statute shall be harmonized with the local laws, the Agricultural Department has fixed open and closed seasons that differ from our own, and it is this that makes the principle of the law in its application particularly vicious.

Mr. President, if the fact that birds are migratory or insectivorous can give Congress jurisdiction to legislate concerning their custody or protection——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he thinks, in the event that a treaty between this Government and Great Britain should be ratified, and that treaty took into consideration the existence of this very law, Congress would not have the power to enforce the provisions of that treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I said in the earlier part of my remarks that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] at the very time the migratory-bird bill was under discussion in the Senate had offered a resolution calling upon the President to negotiate some kind of a treaty between this and other North American Governments for the purpose of mutually protecting migratory birds. The treaty-making power of the United States Government is of course a very broad one. There have been and in the nature of the subject there can be few, if any, limitations by court decisions on the treaty-making power of the United States. There is no such treaty now as that to which the Senator refers. I can not look into the future and determine what may be accomplished under a treaty that has not been negotiated and, therefore, has not been ratified. I would not undertake to say at this time that the subject is not one with which the United States Government could deal in a treaty; there is a conflict among the authorities on that subject. Mr. Henry St. George Tucker, in a recent article printed in the North American Review, took the position that it is not within the power of the Government in the exercise of the treaty-making power to invalidate any provision of the Constitution of the United States or to reduce or minimize the powers reserved to the States under that instrument. That is a controversy that has been raging about the alien land ownership question in the State of California; that subject has been discussed a great deal; and I repeat that I would not undertake to say now that the United States Government can not hereafter negotiate a treaty upon this subject with Great Britain or with the Dominion of Canada or with other North American governmental powers. I would not undertake to say whether a law hereafter passed to carry out a treaty hereafter negotiated and ratified would be unconstitutional. I can not pass upon that question now. It is doubtful, however, whether it is within the province of Congress to pass a law admittedly unconstitutional, in violation of the very fundamental principles of the Constitution, and then support that act by a treaty subsequently negotiated.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not care to interrupt the Senator if he objects to my doing so——

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not object.

Mr. McLEAN. I want to call his attention to the fact that he has just referred to an argument of Mr. St. George Tucker on this subject. I ask the Senator if he has had his attention called to the footnote which Mr. Tucker appended to his argument, on page 15?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not remember the page, but I do recall that there was a note appended to the argument.

Mr. McLEAN. I think it very opportune that I read it to the Senator, because I think it very important.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Connecticut may read it.

Mr. McLEAN. It is as follows:

> The limits of this paper do not permit the discussion and analysis of the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States from Ware v. Hylton (3 Dallas, 199) to Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 258), which are claimed to be opposed to the views expressed above.

I simply call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States do not sustain Mr. Tucker's opinion, and he himself is frank enough to call attention to that fact in his own argument.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have said that that is a mooted question. I did not intend to say, nor do I think my language so implies, that I indorse unqualifiedly or in any way the argument of Mr. Tucker. I realize that there are some authorities which contend that the treaty-making power is practically unlimited, and I did call attention to the fact that Mr. Tucker had taken the position that it is not within the power of the Government, in the exercise of the treaty-making power, to destroy or abrogate any provision of the Constitution of the United States, because it is expressly provided that the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, as well as treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question in connection with the note which he has just read. Does the Senator from Connecticut claim that the treaty-making power is sufficient and efficient to provide for treaties which would be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States with reference to the division of powers between the National and the State Governments?

Mr. McLEAN. Not at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator must do so to sustain this act.

Mr. McLEAN. All I claim is that the protection of migratory birds would fall within the treaty-making power. As that question is up, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the opinion of Mr. Charles Henry Butler in the latest edition of his work on the Treaty-making Power of the United States. It is very brief. It is based upon a long line of decisions, and it seems to me to state very clearly the position of those who believe, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and other Senators believe, that it is a proper subject for a treaty, and that Congress would undoubtedly have the right to enforce the provisions of that treaty by legislation. Mr. Butler says:

> The treaty-making power of the United States as vested in the Central Government is derived not only from the powers expressly conferred by the Constitution, but that it is also possessed by that Government as an attribute of sovereignty, and that it extends to every subject which can be the basis of negotiation and contract between any of the sovereign powers of the world or in regard to which the several States of the Union themselves could have negotiated and contracted if the Constitution had not expressly prohibited the States from exercising the treaty-making power in any manner whatever and vested that power exclusively in and expressly delegated it to the Federal Government.
> This power exists in and can be exercised by the National Government whenever foreign relations of any kind are established with any other sovereign power in regulating by treaty the use of property belonging to States or the citizens thereof, such as canals, railroads, fisheries, public lands, mining claims, etc.

I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that we have already pending treaties with Great Britain which regulate the taking of the swimming fishes in the Great Lakes, and it seems to me the analogy is plain. In view of the further fact that 14 of the nations of Europe already protect their migratory birds under an international agreement, it seems to me that there can be no question that this is a proper subject for a treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have already stated that the treaty-making power of the United States is very broad; that its limitations have not been expressly defined, and, in the very nature of the subject, it is not probable that they will be expressly defined by court decisions; but I call attention to the fact that it is not claimed that this act was enacted in pursuance of any treaty relationship between the United States and the Dominion of Canada. It is not claimed by anyone that any treaty is now in existence; it is simply said "we will ask the President to negotiate a treaty"; that an effort will be made hereafter to negotiate a treaty to support this law. If by the treaty-making power the Federal Government can exercise jurisdiction over the subject, it must begin with the exercise of that power. The fact that some Member of Congress or anyone else has in contemplation the negotiation of a treaty does not give Congress the power to legislate upon a subject which, under the Constitution, is reserved to the States.

Passing over for the time being the question as to whether or not in the exercise of the treaty-making power the Federal Government can strip the States of their power reserved to them under the Constitution, I say that the question does not properly arise here, because there is no treaty. Whatever may be the limitations on the treaty-making power, no man can fairly claim that it is unlimited. For example, could the United States negotiate a treaty with Great Britain or with France or with any other foreign power, eliminating the House of Representatives or the Senate of the United States from the right to participate in the making of laws?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose that most of those who doubt the constitutionality of this law would like to see some such law in effect, but certainly the authorities cited by the Senator from Connecticut do not reach the question which has been presented here. If you can deal by treaty with one class of property in a State, you can deal with another class of property within a State; and if you can say what shall be done with reference to birds and other property or other property rights, you can say that by treaty the Japanese shall own land in California. It does not make any difference what the treaty-making power is nor how great it is, it is not and never has been construed, and never will be construed, to wipe out the distinction between the National Government and the State governments with reference to the distribution of power under the Constitution.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I think I will have to read the rest of this page from Butler on the "Treaty-making power of the United States." The writer goes on to say:

> In regulating the descent or possession of property within the otherwise exclusive jurisdiction of States; in surrendering citizens and inhabitants of States to foreign powers for punishment of crimes committed outside of the jurisdiction of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof; in fact, that the power of the United States to enter into treaty stipulations in regard to all matters which can properly be the subject of negotiations between sovereign States is practically unlimited.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, the writer continues—> and that in no case is the sanction, aid, or consent of any State necessary to validate the treaty or to enforce its provisions.

> Third. That the power to legislate in regard to all matters affected by treaty stipulations and relations is coextensive with the treaty-making power, and that the acts of Congress enforcing such stipulations which, in the absence of treaty stipulations, would be unconstitutional as infringing upon the powers reserved to the States.

And then the cases cited, which the Senator very well knows, are numerous where the States have had sole power to regulate the title of property belonging to aliens in the absence of a treaty, and yet in the presence of a treaty the treaty at once controls and the jurisdiction of the State is lost.

Mr. BORAH. Then, as I understand the position of the Senator from Connecticut, the disturbance and difficulty over the Japanese question has been entirely unnecessary, and all that was necessary for the Government of the United States to do was to extend the terms of the treaty with Japan, or, without consulting California or sending the Secretary of State there to plead with the citizens of California, to have negotiated a treaty providing that the Japanese could own property in the State of California as they saw fit and own it as any other citizens might own it.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is stating the proposition too broadly; he includes too much.

Mr. BORAH. I am only stating it to that extent to which the logic of the Senator will inevitably lead——

Mr. McLEAN. I think not.

Mr. BORAH. Because if the United States can deal with one class of property—that is, as against the distribution of powers between the States and the National Government—it can deal with another; and if it can deal with it at all, it can deal with it to its full extent.

Mr. McLEAN. A State might have full jurisdiction to regulate the conditions of property belonging to aliens in that State, and in many States the property of aliens is escheated under the local law, but where the matter is regulated by treaty the treaty is regarded by the courts. There is no difference in opinion; there are no cases which intimate anything to the contrary.

Mr. BORAH. To the contrary of what?

Mr. McLEAN. That the Federal Government has the authority to enforce the provisions of a treaty——

Mr. BORAH. Yes; properly made.

Mr. McLEAN. Regulating the descent of property in a State, where, in the absence of such a treaty, the State would have full jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, the Senator contends that the distribution of power between the States and the National Government does not stand in the way of the treaty-making power?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; that is the logic of the contention of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I did not quite catch the Senator's statement.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator contends that that with which it is now in the sovereign power of the State to deal would be taken out from the power of the State under its sovereignty by virtue of a treaty.

Mr. McLEAN. In certain instances, but not in all cases. Where it is a proper subject for international negotiations, it can be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the discussion as to the treaty-making power as involved in the consideration of this bill is more or less academic. I have already stated that there is no treaty governing this subject. The mere statement of individuals that a treaty is in contemplation can not be sufficient warrant for a Senator to violate his obligation to support the Constitution of the United States. No man can successfully contend that the power to regulate the killing of migratory birds is under the Constitution of the United States conferred on the Federal Government. Every lawyer knows that the Federal Government is one of delegated powers. If the Constitution does not carry that authority, either expressly or impliedly, the power does not exist. All of the authorities indicate that the control of this subject is within the States. The fact that these birds are migratory or insectivorous, in my judgment, reflects no light upon the controversy whatever. Migratory birds in their flights are not engaged in commerce, and you can not assume jurisdiction of the killing of game in the States without violating the plain provisions of the Constitution and the rules of construction that have been applied to it since the day of its adoption.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield further?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator say that there are no lawyers who hold that the migratory bird law is constitutional?

Mr. ROBINSON. I would say that there are no good ones.

Mr. McLEAN. Has the Senator ever read the argument of Mr. George Shiras, jr., of New York, in relation to this matter?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I have not. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut if the argument he himself made in the Senate when this bill was under consideration did not, as I have already stated, clearly imply his own doubt as to the constitutionality of the legislation? I will ask him now if he will say that he thinks the act of March 4, 1913, the so-called migratory bird law, is constitutional and within the lawful exercise of the authority of Congress?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I am not certain as to the constitutionality of this law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Connecticut seek to justify the appropriation in the pending bill on the theory that Congress habitually violates its obligations to the people of the United States to support the Constitution of this country?

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator will wait, I should like to answer his question. As I have said, I am not certain of the constitutionality of this law. The Supreme Court has authority to pass on the constitutionality of all Federal laws, and I think history records that a great many good lawyers have been disappointed in their views in regard to the constitutionality of acts of Congress. I will say to the Senator, however, that if this law is not constitutional, then, in my opinion, 50 per cent of the money that has been appropriated in this bill has been appropriated for the administration and enforcement of unconstitutional acts. If this law is unconstitutional, then I do not believe that a single one of the appropriations which have been made for the protection of a State or a group of States in this Union to prevent the invasion of insects is constitutional. I am not certain, of course, but I believe that there is room enough in the Constitution, and plenty of it, for this law.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut to tell me upon what provision in the Constitution he bases the right of Congress to legislate upon this subject.

Mr. McLEAN. Well, Mr. President, I tried to make that clear when the migratory-bird bill was under discussion in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will say to the Senator that I was not then here, and did not hear the discussion at that time.

Mr. McLEAN. This matter has been pending in Congress for something like eight years, and it has been thoroughly discussed over and over again.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator——

Mr. McLEAN. I will answer the Senator's question if he will give me time, if he wishes me to do so; it will take perhaps a minute and a half to do it. I want to say to the Senator that there has never been a reform of any breadth of application or scope that has not been denounced as unconstitutional and in violation of the sacred, fundamental rights of either the States or the people; but, Mr. President, reforms come and the phantoms and shadows of the opposition do not stay their progress very long when the reforms are supported by the right sort of patriotism and common sense. If the Senator will take a map of the Western Hemisphere and locate the State of Arkansas and say that he thinks that that State, acting single-handed, can render effective protection to the 100 varieties or more of useful migratory birds, not 1 per cent of which ever come within gunshot of his State in their annual migration—if he thinks the State of Arkansas, acting alone, can perform that miracle, then there is some foundation for his opposition. But, sir, I believe it is just as much within the power of the Federal Government to protect a State or a group of States against the invasion of noxious insects by protecting the migratory insectivorous birds as it is to protect a State or a group of States against the invasion of destructive insects by the use of poisons or parasites.

I believe it is just as much within the power of the Federal Government to protect a State or group of States against the invasion of irresistible hordes of destructive insects as it is to protect a State or group of States against the invasion of the cholera or the bubonic plague.

I ask the Senator to try to get his eyes away from the shotgun in this discussion. There is no right to kill that is not conferred in the first place by the sovereignty. There is no property in the feræ naturæ. The paramount right is the right to the protection which the birds offer to the agricultural interests of this country. Will the Senator claim that any State acting alone is competent to secure for itself the protection which these birds offer? It is ridiculous to claim that.

Therefore I say, Mr. President, that the fact that any State acting alone is incompetent to preserve that right the Federal Government at once has the right to furnish that protection.

Not one of the cases which the Senator has cited involves this question, or comes anywhere near it. In no case was the issue any other than that the State had the right to protect its resident birds. The question whether the Federal Government might not assert its dormant right to protect migratory birds never has been raised, and I have always said that this is fallow ground; that the Supreme Court never has passed upon it; but, in my opinion, those who believe this law is constitutional are quite as likely to have their judgment approved as those who believe it is not constitutional.

That, however, is not the question here. The question here is whether this treaty which we have requested the President to negotiate with Great Britain, when it comes to us and is ratified, will not then heal any constitutional infirmity which the law may have. I wish to say that in that opinion I am supported by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and many other Senators in this body whose opinions upon constitutional questions are considered to be sound and worthy of consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. It seems that this is another case in which we will have to call upon Great Britain to enable us to legislate concerning our domestic affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator pleases, I would rather have him confine his remarks to a discussion of the subject under consideration.

Mr. BORAH. I am going to do that, with a preface.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. BORAH. What I was going to say is that if we can not ourselves deal with this matter, because of the distribution of powers under the Constitution with reference to the State and National Governments, it seems to me inconceivable that we can get any aid by going to a foreign Government and making a treaty with that Government. That does not redistribute the powers between the two sovereignties. That does not change the provision of the Constitution.

Mr. McLEAN. Then why are we seeking treaties with Great Britain to regulate the taking of fishes in the Great Lakes?

Mr. BORAH. That is an entirely different proposition, because it is subject to international action. That does not have anything at all to do with the distribution of powers between the State and the National Governments.

Mr. McLEAN. These birds are in this country to-day and in the territory of Great Britain to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but when they are within a State they are in a different attitude as property than the fish which are in the Great Lakes, because the Great Lakes are under a different jurisdiction.

Mr. McLEAN. Not at all; because when the fish are in the Great Lakes they are at times entirely within the jurisdiction of the States.

Mr. BORAH. But the Great Lakes are not considered as part and parcel of the States for this purpose.

Mr. McLEAN. Neither is the atmosphere covering the Western Hemisphere considered a part and parcel of the United States for this purpose.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, we have some lakes wholly within our State, and Great Britain and the United States combined could not control the situation within those lakes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that reasoning is clear.

Mr. BORAH. Just one more thing, and then I will not press this matter further. The Senator says that these reforms come, and they will come, in spite of the Constitution. I concede that proposition; but would it not be infinitely better, where we find things ought to be done and that we have not the power to do them, to go to the people and get that power through an amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I did not say that. I said they would come in spite of the shadows and phantoms summoned by those who are opposed to them.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, we shall need an expert on shadows and phantoms before we can determine what are shadows and phantoms; but we still have a kind of affection for that which was the Constitution of the United States, and notwithstanding the fact that these reforms come and will come in spite of the Constitution of the United States, permit some of us to call attention as we pass by to the fact that this Government was built up to its present strength and power by observing the Constitution of the United States. When you leave it, you will in time return to it, and you will return to it in sackcloth and ashes. Our forbears thought it wise to amend the Constitution rather than violate it.

Mr. McLEAN. That is for the Senator to prophesy.

Mr. BORAH. Let me read a paragraph from the Supreme Court of the United States, where this same doctrine was announced by the attorney at the bar. This is the opinion of the court in the case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46). I read from page 89:

> But clearly it (section 3 of Article IV) does not grant to Congress any legislative control over the States, and must, so far as they are concerned, be limited to authority over the property belonging to the United States within their limits. Appreciating the force of this, counsel for the Government relies upon "the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power," adding, "I am aware that in advancing this doctrine I seem to challenge great decisions of the court, and I speak with deference." His argument runs substantially along this line: All legislative power must be vested in either the State or the National Government; no legislative powers belong to a State government other than those which affect solely the internal affairs of that State; consequently all powers which are national in their scope must be found vested in the Congress of the United States.

That is the argument, put in a very effective way, of the Senator from Connecticut: Because the State can not do it, because the State is not in position to exercise the power, then necessarily it must follow that it is in the Congress of the United States.

> But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers. That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendment, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which have not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. It reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The argument of counsel ignores the principal factor in this article, to wit, "the people." Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it, "We the people of the United States," not the people of one State, but the people of all the States, and Article X reserves to the people of all the States the powers not delegated to the United States.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I think this is a wise measure, and I am not opposed to it for the reason that I am opposed to the policy; but even insectivorous birds or migratory birds can not change my view of the Constitution of the United States or change the written interpretation which has been so often placed upon it by the Supreme Court. I think there is a wiser, a safer, and, in the long run, a quicker way to accomplish what we all desire.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question before he takes his seat. Having expressed his approval of the purposes of the law, and it being a law on the statute books, does he not think the proper place to determine its constitutional effect or value is before the courts, and that we should make suitable appropriation to carry out the law as long as it is a law?

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the bill provides an appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the law until the Supreme Court shall have passed upon it.

Mr. WEEKS. It provides $10,000; but that is nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the purpose of the committee in providing this $10,000 was the same as that which I understand to be embraced in the act of March 4, 1913—that the validity of the act shall be determined.

I have already stated that the department itself, believing the act unconstitutional, has failed to permit it to be tested. It has taken pleas of guilty where defendants were willing to plead guilty, and has refused to prosecute or present to the courts cases so that the constitutionality of the act might be finally determined.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. McLEAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield, and to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Inasmuch as the appropriation heretofore made manifestly was insufficient for the purpose, and the department asked for $100,000, does it not follow that we ought to appropriate something more than the $10,000 that we formerly appropriated?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think not; and I will state my reasons for that position.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let me add that I intended to interrogate the Senator on the very point that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] raised. Should we govern our legislation on this or any other matter by the fact that some eminent lawyers have said that a law that we passed was unconstitutional before it has been tested in the courts?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, certainly not. Every Member of Congress is under the obligation of determining the constitutionality of the act for himself. That is a matter which addresses itself to the conscience of every Member of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. Just one other question and I am done. The Senator says he finds nothing in the Constitution, either direct or implied, that warrants this legislation. Does the Senator find anything in the Constitution that warrants the Agricultural Department in sending men to the State of New Hampshire to slaughter cattle, or does the Senator find anything in the Constitution that gives the Government authority to send its agents into the State of Arkansas, in the event of an epidemic, for the purpose of trying to stamp it out?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, of course as to property, which is designed and intended to enter into interstate commerce, on that view of the question the authority of the United States might be admitted, but I do not think it is fair for Senators to consume my time by asking hypothetical questions. I am presenting to the Senate of the United States a simple proposition upon its own merits.

I wish now to reply to some things that were stated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] a few minutes ago, before the Senator from Idaho made his remarks. He impliedly characterized those of us who were unwilling to appropriate a large sum of money and create an enormous force in the Department of Agriculture for the enforcement of this act as lacking in patriotism or common sense.

Mr. President, in reply to that statement I wish to say that my conception of patriotism is that under my oath of office as a Senator I shall always be loyal to the Constitution of the United States. Neither the fevered imagination of fanaticism nor the excitement of those who would give undue proportions to any question can induce me knowingly to vote for the appropriation of a large sum of money for a purpose which I, in my conscience, believe to be a violation of the Constitution of the United States. The Senator from New Hampshire may satisfy himself in voting for this appropriation, which he knows is unconstitutional, on the theory that he has knowingly voted for other appropriations for the Department of Agriculture which were unconstitutional. I do neither. I vote for no appropriation for any purpose which in my conscience I believe is a violation of the supreme law of this land.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the cases that have been cited, not being a lawyer, I am not going to argue the legal and constitutional aspects of this case; but I wish to say to the Senator that I do not believe this act is unconstitutional, and I shall not believe it until the courts pass upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. In fairness I want to say, in reply to the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, that I merely inferred that from the question which he asked me. He did not make the direct statement, of course.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator is very kind.

The Senator has quoted freely from the Secretary of Agriculture. He had just completed his quotation when he was interrupted by the Senator from New Hampshire. I, also, have a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture on this subject. I will send it to the desk, and I should like to have it read.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

Mr. BORAH. Is that on the constitutional question?

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator will be able to judge of that from the reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 23, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE P. McLEAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR McLEAN: I have your letter of April 22, in reference to the migratory bird law. In the first paragraph of your letter you refer to my letter as stating the reasons why I opposed the appropriation for the administration of this law. You evidently have been misinformed or labor under a misunderstanding of my letter of April 21. I approved an estimate of $100,000 for the administration of the migratory bird law; the House committee reduced that to $50,000, as you know. The Senate committee, I understand, at first omitted the item entirely, and subsequently inserted an appropriation of $10,000.

Recently I had the honor to be before the Senate committee on another matter, and I voluntarily brought up the enforcement of the migratory bird law. I called attention to the fact that my estimates contained an item of $100,000; that the House committee had reduced it to $50,000, and that the Senate committee had finally placed an item of $10,000 in the bill. I expressed appreciation of the difficulty which I understood was in the minds of the Senate committee, namely, that they hesitated to build up an organization which might have to be abandoned with great hardship to many individuals should the law be declared invalid, but I suggested that the law was a very beneficient one and that it should be enforced so long as it was on the statute books. I further expressed the earnest hope that it would never be upset. I closed by suggesting that in my judgment a larger appropriation than $10,000 would be warranted, and that a larger appropriation could be used without creating a staff so large that it could not be taken care of in case the law was overthrown.

This sets before your mind fully my position. I think the law is one of the best that has been placed upon the statute books, and I sincerely hope that it will for many years be the law of the land.

As to the matter of testing the law, I personally have no desire to press the matter. The only question is whether it can be kept out of the courts. There is pressure on the Department of Justice to have the law tested.

I intended in my former letter to you to convey to your mind just what I have said in this letter. So far as I can see, I am thoroughly in accord with you as to the desirability of this legislation and as to its enforcement, and I shall be glad at any time if you desire to take the matter up further with me to have the pleasure of a conference with you.

Very truly, yours, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I stated in the beginning that the Department of Agriculture had practically admitted the unconstitutionality of this act. Dr. Galloway, who represented the Secretary of Agriculture before the Senate committee, admitted its unconstitutionality, and said to the committee that the validity of the act ought to be determined before any appropriation was made further than the amount necessary to try out fairly the question of the constitutionality of the act. It was in part upon that statement by the representative of the Department of Agriculture, Dr. Galloway, that this amendment was inserted.

Secretary Houston, whose letter has just been read at the request of our friend the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], stated before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I am informed, that fifteen or twenty thousand dollars was all he thought ought to be appropriated now. The committee took the view that since, as indicated by the letter, he is loath to permit the question of the validity of the act to be determined, it is of importance to try out this question fairly before embarking upon a policy which will involve the Government of the United States in an annual expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. President, another suggestion. So-called "insectivorous" birds destroy both useful and harmful insects, and therefore they are not themselves wholly beneficial. The advocates of this measure talk as if there were no such thing as good bugs and bad bugs; but the Department of Agriculture tells us that many insects are useful because they prey upon other insects which are harmful.

It is said that this law was intended, in part, to protect robins. These birds are very destructive of fruits. In some localities in New Jersey it has been impossible to ripen strawberries unless covered with netting. Robins are very destructive of cherries, having, it is claimed, damaged single orchards in a given season more than $1,000. The same is true as to grapes.

Moreover, these birds distribute from tree to tree and from orchard to orchard the San Jose scale, which has occasioned millions of dollars' loss to fruit growers in various parts of the United States. It is also claimed that the robin is a means of spreading anthrax, which is very fatal to cattle. It may be well to remember that while it is desirable to conserve in every constitutional way our wild life in the United States, it is also necessary to regard the subject in its fair proportions.

It is impossible to enjoy the fruits and benefits of refined civilization and at the same time retain the peculiar and pleasing characteristics, including that wonderful diversity of wild life, of partially civilized communities.

It has been urged by some that the passage of the act of March 4, 1913, by Congress forecloses, as to this body, any question as to its constitutionality and that Congress is impliedly obligated to appropriate sufficient sums for the enforcement of any act it passes, without regard to the question of its constitutionality, so long as the act remains unrepealed. I do not take this view. The obligation of a Member of Congress to support the Constitution of the United States affects the individual consciences of Members, and I do not believe one is ever justified in proceeding in disregard for the Constitution. I do not question the right of others to determine this or any other subject for themselves.

If the act is clearly unconstitutional—and who can doubt it—or of gravely doubtful validity, no fair-minded person can be resentful if Congress insists, before creating a large number of offices and employees under its provisions and appropriating large sums for the payment of their salaries, that the validity of the act shall first be established. Does anyone here contend that the Federal Government should seek to exercise a power which it does not possess and override the plain provisions of the Constitution which prescribes its powers and duties? Does anyone doubt, since the attorney general of New York has declared the act unconstitutional, that it will either be unenforced as to that State or that its validity will be tested.

Another consideration: Ten thousand dollars is not adequate to enforce this statute throughout the United States; neither is $50,000. To provide necessary employees in the 48 States for the proper enforcement of this act and for the prosecution of violations will require a very large force and, in all probability, several hundred thousand dollars annually. It is inconceivable that if the act is unconstitutional the department can continue to evade the final determination of the courts to that effect. Is it not, therefore, wiser, fairer, better to determine whether the act is valid? Neither intolerance nor intimidation can escape the logical conclusion that the best thing to do, the sensible thing to do, is to establish in the usual way the right of the Federal Government to regulate this subject before becoming committed to a policy that will occasion fruitless expenditure of large sums of money.

I thank the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I only wish to say a word somewhat in explanation of the small part which I have taken in this discussion.

When the migratory bird bill was before the Senate in the first place, as is known by the Senator from Connecticut, I entertained doubt as to its constitutionality. I have never read or heard any argument since which removed that doubt; but I was then, as I am now, in favor of the policy or principle. I should like to see the purposes of the bill carried into effect. I want to see these birds protected. I therefore took very little part in the discussion and did not seek to defeat the bill. I was willing to let it pass without any further discussion than to indicate my view as to its constitutionality.

Mr. President, there is a way in which these things can be accomplished. In the long run it would prove the wiser way. I have believed for many years that there would necessarily have to be a redistribution of the powers under our National Constitution. I do not believe there is a lawyer in the Senate who does not understand that we are constantly doing things which are in violation of the Constitution of the United States. We are exercising powers which the National Government has no right to exercise under the Constitution. This bill itself, in my judgment, contains many instances and illustrations of that kind. They are things which the States are not prepared to do, which the State can not do, and yet which, under the National Constitution, no provision has been made by the National Government for doing. The necessity and the great desire to see them accomplished leads us to do these things regardless of the provisions and requirements of the Constitution; and that is precisely the explanation of the passage of this law through the Senate of the United States. I should like to see all these things which really can not be done by the States done by the National Government, but I should like to see the necessary changes made in the Constitution in order that they might be done in an orderly and legal way.

I shall not vote against an appropriation to carry this law into effect, because it is upon the statute books; and, of course, I might be in error in my view of the proposition. But I want to say before sitting down that I doubt its being constitutional, and it will have to be tested in the courts. I presume the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Justice feel just the same way about it, and therefore they have hesitated about bringing the matter to a final determination.

Undoubtedly the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was correct in his idea that as the law is upon the statute books there should be sufficient appropriation to test it, not only because it is there, but because the policy of it is well grounded. But I want to record, nevertheless, in passing, that in my opinion it is only one of many laws of this kind which are being passed without the real conviction and judgment of the Senate as to their constitutionality behind them. The evil of that is that they pass on to the courts, and the courts are bound by a different rule and obligated by a different view of the situation, very often holding those provisions of the statute which we pass as constitutional unconstitutional, and therefore the courts are constantly challenged throughout the country as being obstructive in their nature and in their disposition with reference to legislation.

The fact is that if Congress would apply the same rule that the Supreme Court of the United States feels bound to apply, a great number of these measures would never reach the Supreme Court of the United States, and the great and onerous burden would not be placed upon it of declaring many things unconstitutional which we believe as our final judgment are unconstitutional.

Of course, this is not the time to discuss it, but sooner or later we will have to consider the proposition of a redistribution of powers under the national Constitution. Either that, or we will have the arguments which have been made here to-day, to the practical effect that whatever we want to do we should do, regardless of the law behind it; that whatever the public welfare or public necessity seems to us to say should be done, we should do.

Now, that would be all right for the Parliament of England, but our fathers framed a different line of action and made a different kind of Government. Washington said:

> If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation, for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

I concede the point made by the Senator from New Hampshire that there are plenty of precedents for this matter; that there are plenty of incidents to be found in which the same rule has been adopted with reference to putting a law upon the statute books, and plenty of the same kind of action upon the part of the departments to withhold it from a contest or from a test until such time as by custom and habit a disposition to contest it at all has passed away, and it settles into our jurisprudence and into our laws, without any decision being taken upon the question by any department of the Government. This may result in the same thing.

In concluding, what I have said is not in contravention of the policy of the law, but simply to express in passing my view of its constitutionality.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, during the discussion of this Agricultural appropriation bill we have been listening for more than an hour to very earnest and able legal arguments. The agriculturist has given place to the jurist and to the lawyer for the time.

The proper method to pursue, if a law is unconstitutional, is to immediately bring forward a proposition for its repeal, but so long as it remains upon the statute books and a certain amount of money is required for its execution we should provide that amount.

I have very grave doubt as to the constitutionality of this measure, though it clearly does not go further than other activities of the Agricultural Department. I especially deprecate the disposition which is so often manifested here to consent whenever an appropriation benefits a locality or State, but to protest in earnest language when it imposes a burden or controls action which those of the locality desire should be free and untrammeled. But to resume.

To my mind our plain duty, so long as this statute is on the books here, is to appropriate to carry it out. Let us consider for a few minutes where we will land if we pursue any other policy. Suppose a statute is passed which is clearly constitutional, but at the following Congress, by reason of a change of parties or otherwise, there is a reaction against the measure. Let us still further suppose you could pass a bill to repeal the law in the Senate but not in the House. What would happen? In that branch of Congress opposed to the execution of that law the argument could be made that it is unconstitutional; consequently we will make no appropriations for its enforcement. So the law on the statute books, a law which should be enforced, would be nugatory.

I say we are starting out on a dangerous road when by reason of alleged unconstitutionality we refuse an appropriation to carry out a statute deliberately passed by both House of Congress.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. I see the trouble in this appropriation bill. If we increase the appropriation, believing that it is unconstitutional, it would require several hundred thousand dollars in order to have the appropriation sufficient to furnish perfect machinery in all the States to carry out this law.

Mr. BURTON. That is, the Senator means the execution of the law itself.

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir; the execution of the law itself. My idea about this appropriation of $10,000 is that before the Government goes to all that expense let us have $10,000 appropriated in order to test the constitutionality of the law.

Mr. BURTON. Let me say to my friend from Georgia that the expense of the legal department in defending the law does not belong to the Agricultural appropriation act, but rather to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice would be called upon to defend the measure if its validity were tested in the courts.

Mr. WEST. I understand that, but this appropriation will be sufficient in a measure for a test case in order that somebody may be brought before the courts and a test case made of it.

Mr. BURTON. Let us see where we would place ourselves under such a plan as that. Such a course would be an express admission that a statute which we have deliberately passed has no binding force, even though it may not be questioned. It would be saying we will do nothing to carry that statute into effect, nothing to regulate the movement of migratory birds.

We would absolutely abandon the enforcement of the law, because some one has raised the question of constitutionality, and that too, as I understand, when there is not a single case pending in any of the courts in which the validity of the act has been questioned. I may be in error in that, but I understand that there is not a single case pending, and that no one has chosen anywhere to defend himself for any infraction of this law.

Mr. BORAH. I understand there has been a kind of an agreement all around that nobody should test it, that everybody desires it should go along because it is a good thing, and they are afraid if it gets up against the courts it will be knocked out.

Mr. WEST and Mr. McLEAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield, and to whom?

Mr. BURTON. I think such a situation is hardly possible. That would involve an exceedingly amicable disposition toward the measure all over the country. If the law is so generally acquiesced in that no one cares to defend himself or test its validity, I do not see how it is incumbent upon the officers of the Government, nor yet upon Congress, to be disturbed by fears as to its constitutionality.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURTON. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia, if the Senator from Oklahoma will pardon me.

Mr. WEST. Wherever there is a law the constitutionality of which is doubted, the time will come when that law will be tested, and the position I take is that when we have gone on and furnished the perfect machinery of this great Government in every State at a large expense, and then it is brought up before the Supreme Court of the United States and the law is declared unconstitutional, we have unnecessarily spent a great deal of money before the matter has been tried out.

Mr. BURTON. As a question of public policy I can not agree with the Senator from Georgia. A mere phantom might be raised to cast doubt upon the validity of the law when, as in this very case, there is not a single person contesting its validity.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that in the majority of cases, I understand in practically all of the cases, the fines have been nominal, that they have been so small, indeed, as not to justify the prosecution on an appeal. There is a South Dakota case, I understand, in which the fine was $100, and in which the question of the constitutionality of the law has been raised. My understanding is that the case will be prosecuted in the Supreme Court.

Mr. BURTON. Then, there is one case in which a doubt has been raised as to the validity of the law?

Mr. GORE. There is one case of which I am advised. There may be many others. So far as I know, I have understood that there has been a disposition on the part of the friends of the measure not to bring it to a final test.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I may add the committee signified to the Secretary of Agriculture that it was the desire of the committee that the constitutionality should be tested, and there will be no difficulty whatever in obtaining an adequate appropriation in case the constitutionality of the measure should be sustained. If I may add a sentence, the committee was unwilling to create a large force of Government employees who were to be covered into the civil service, as we were advised, on April 20, and have this corps of employees on our hands in case the measure should fail when finally tested in the courts.

The Senator from Ohio and other Senators will remember that last year we had some 300 employees dismissed from the service of the Government, and there was a lot of scurrying around here in an effort to reinstate them in the service. We thought it unfair to those employees and unfair to the Government to have this policy continue until we knew whether the law would stand when tested in the courts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, I can understand perfectly well how the committee thinking a given law unconstitutional could refuse to appropriate for it, notwithstanding the objections suggested by the Senator from Ohio that that would be virtually having one House repeal a law which had been passed by two Houses and the President. Each Member of each branch of the Legislature is sworn to construe the Constitution whenever he votes. The question I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio is this: Does the Senator know of anything concerning which it may be soundly predicated that $10,000 worth of it is constitutional and $50,000 worth of it is unconstitutional?

Mr. BURTON. I think not. I think if we appropriate $10,000 here we——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That seems to me to be the logic of the committee's action.

Mr. BURTON. We have recognized that the law should be enforced $10,000 worth. There would be no more serious strain on the Constitution if we appropriated fifty thousand or one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. Perhaps I ought to say at this point in behalf of the committee that I think a number of the members of the committee desired to connect this appropriation with the suggestion that it should be used in the trying out of the constitutionality of the act, if that issue should be raised and presented to the department. There were other members of the committee who thought an express challenge of the constitutionality of the measure in an appropriation bill would hardly be advisable, and that sentiment prevailed. So the express direction to use this money in determining the constitutionality of the act was omitted from the bill. That is the reason why we appropriated $10,000. There were some of us who thought that since the statute had been duly enacted we were hardly justified in withholding an appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to administer the law. The Secretary himself suggested that $15,000 or $20,000 would enable him to maintain his organization and to enforce the measure in an efficient way, as has been done heretofore.

I may say that I think if the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] had been present when that suggestion was made the committee would probably have raised the amount to $20,000, but as he had been especially active in the matter we were unwilling to take action during his absence. After he returned the subject was not again referred to. It was an oversight, I may say.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, as long as this law is upon the statute books it is for us to provide the means to enforce it. The statement has been made that we must observe the Constitution. There is no presumption that Congress has passed a law that is unconstitutional, particularly when there has been no decision of the courts declaring it invalid.

I may concede for the sake of argument that if there is a law that is generally conceded to be unconstitutional, a Member of the House or Senate might well hesitate in voting for an appropriation to carry it out. But that is not true of this measure. The laws already referred to, the appropriation for the extinction of the boll weevil, the law authorizing officials of the United States to go right within the borders of a State of this Union and seize upon cattle that never have been outside of that State, and very likely never would go beyond its borders, are certainly as much an infraction of the Constitution as anything contained in this statute.

Everyone will concede that it is a question about which there can be an honest difference of opinion. So I trust, Mr. President, the provision made by the House may prevail and this amendment be voted down.

I want to say just a word, although I had not started out to do so, about the desirability of the enforcement of such a measure. There is a certain balance in nature. Birds destroy noxious insects, and if you kill off the birds the insects thrive and cause widespread damage and even destruction to crops as well as to many forms of animal life.

One of the most serious injuries to our agriculture in the last 10 or 20 years has been the indiscriminate destruction of certain birds, the preservation of whose lives is necessary to maintain the balance of which I have spoken.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of curiosity to the argument made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], to the effect that this legislation is unconstitutional, and, like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who has so ably addressed himself to that contention, I can not understand why it is not as constitutional as is another provision in this bill which gives the Government the power to enter the States for the destruction of the boll weevil or to do so for the prevention of disease among cattle which are to be transported from one State to another. It seems to me that the same general principle applies to the one that applies to the other. It may be necessary at any time for the benefit of the people of the country at large to enter a State for the mitigation of any pest which is a menace to the Nation at large. It should lie, I think, well within the constitutional power of the General Government to take the proper steps in any State in order to mitigate such a pest. Inasmuch as migratory birds do destroy such pests, without cost to the Government, I do not see why legislation for their protection should be more subject to constitutional restrictions than would be the sending of an employee of the Government, whose expenses the Government has to pay, into the same State for identically the same general purpose, though it may be in the pursuit of a different type of pest.

It seems to me that every argument would be in favor of the protection of the birds. They do the work of destroying insects without cost to anyone and to the benefit of people living in adjoining States as well.

If you permit migratory birds in the spring season to be killed in certain favorable localities while they are en route to their nesting grounds, they are placed at a great disadvantage. There are certain strategic points or passways where, if they are allowed to be killed, it will not be long before they will become exterminated. The wild pigeon of the South, and of the East for that matter, has in this way been exterminated. In my section of the country they have exterminated the great bulk not only of the migratory birds but of larger game in this manner.

I remember in the winter of 1881 there came out of the Rogue River Valley 10,000 deer hides, which sold on the market for 50 cents each. Those deer were killed for their hides. I have hunted in the mountains and have seen the carcasses of deer left there to rot. They were killed for their hides, worth 50 cents apiece, by hide hunters. The elk which ranged along the coast of Oregon formerly could be sometimes found in bands of 500 or 600. An elk will weigh as much as a thousand pounds. They were practically exterminated for their hides at 50 cents apiece. I do not know of a hundred in all to be found in the State. I know of but one little band up in the mountains of probably a dozen left on the old ground where I used to hunt. Some men will kill them for a tooth to wear for a watch charm.

The geese and ducks in our country in the early days along the Columbia River flats near Portland were countless in numbers, but now they are very scarce. They are protecting them now; they are feeding them; they are actually putting out food for them in order to attract them there. So it has been all through our country with every kind of game, fish, and fowl which were there in countless thousands in the early days. Of course, they had to retreat from civilization, and that was proper; but the needless slaughter of them, in my opinion, is a great wrong; it is a crime against nature. No man knows nor can he foretell what the harm, the damage, will be to the future of the country. It disturbs the balance of nature, and I do not see for the life of me how it can be any more unconstitutional for the Government to say that these wild creatures, which destroy pests and are a benefit to the country, shall be protected for that reason, than it is to send a man into the same State—as we have a perfect right to do—to kill insects of various kinds in other ways. I do not understand any such fine distinction, and I do not believe that if one is constitutional the other is unconstitutional.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I shall not take issue with Senators. These two cases, so far as the law is concerned, may be on all fours with each other, but here is the difference: My purpose in opposing a large appropriation in this bill in connection with the enforcement of the migratory bird act is on account of the necessary machinery which would have to be furnished by the National Government under the civil-service law, although at some time near at hand its constitutionality might be questioned and decided in the courts. A large expenditure would be placed upon the Government, even before the act could be tested, if we should undertake to go into every State and place civil-service appointees there. Consequently, as I have already stated, I think we should have only a small appropriation for this work if there is to be any appropriation at all.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES, BROOKLYN NAVY YARD.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, we are advised that the funeral ship, the U. S. S. Montana, bearing the bodies of the American marines who lost their lives in the conflict of arms at Vera Cruz, will reach our shores on Monday. I am sure that it is the universal sentiment of the Senate that its Members will deem it a mournful pleasure to testify their respect for the memory of these heroic men by having this body stand adjourned on the occasion of the arrival of this ship on her sad mission. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to a point of no quorum. This is a very important subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I myself rose for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Brandegee	Gronna	Norris	Simmons
Burleigh	Johnson	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Burton	Jones	Page	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Perkins	Stone
Chilton	Lane	Robinson	Tillman
Crawford	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Warren
Dillingham	Lewis	Sheppard	Weeks
Gallinger	McLean	Sherman	West

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 12, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 9, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of life and love, we pour out our hearts in gratitude to Thee for all the sweet and tender affections of the home, the sanctity of which is Mother; a name which challenges the respect of all, inspires the fondest recollections, and awakens the deepest reverence. In her, patience knows no bounds; in her, is sacrifice personified; in her, faith finds its highest expression; in her, hope burns brightest; in her, religion never fails; in her, the love of heaven is reflected. No language can express the heroism, power, and beauty of a mother's devotion; and the nation that holds sacred the charm of motherhood will not fail in its quest for righteousness, truth, justice, mercy, liberty. So long as she lives in the heart of the Nation, so long will it live. We thank Thee that our Republic has set apart a day sacred to her memory. God bless our mother. May she ever be an inspiration to nobler life and purer living for all the world. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

W. HENRY PULLIAM.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House briefly concerning the first Virginian who died at Vera Cruz.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, It becomes my sad duty to announce to the Congress the death of W. Henry Pulliam, the first Virginian to offer his life for his country in the hostilities with Mexico. He was a constituent of mine, and comes from the sturdy stock of the people of our Commonwealth, who have been ready at all times to offer themselves in the defense of their homes and their country. His death causes universal sorrow in the district in which he lived, and I insert an article from the Southwest Times, which voices the sentiments of his people regarding the great and patriotic sacrifice that he has made.

The article is as follows:

"A SON OF PULASKI FIRST VIRGINIAN TO DIE AT VERA CRUZ—W. HENRY PULLIAM, WHO WAS WOUNDED AT AMERICAN OCCUPATION OF MEXICAN CITY, DIED TUESDAY—MESSAGE LATE YESTERDAY AFTERNOON—BODY WILL BE BROUGHT HOME FOR INTERMENT.

"W. Henry Pulliam, a Pulaskian, was the first Virginian whose life was sacrificed in the hostilities with Mexico. Wounded ashore at Vera Cruz on April 22, the young man lingered until yesterday (Tuesday) morning at 8 o'clock, when he suddenly died as a result of his wounds received in the engagement in the taking of that port by the American marines. As briefly stated in yesterday's Times, a message was received by his father, Mr. George W. Pulliam, stating that the young man was dead, the message being received here at 3.17 in the afternoon.

"The news of Mr. Pulliam's death was received by the Navy Department at Washington from Admiral Badger. The same was conveyed to Pulaski through Secretary of the Navy Daniels in the following message:

"It is with the deepest regret that the department has received information from the commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet that your son, Mr. Henry Pulliam, fireman first class, died suddenly Tuesday, May 5, 8 a. m. I extend to you my deepest sympathy in the loss of your son. His heroic courage gives him a place among our country's patriotic defenders.

"Please telegraph if you wish the remains sent home.

"In response to the message the grief-stricken father wired the department to send the remains home, and asked to be advised when they could be expected to reach here. When the body reaches home it will be received in a manner fitting that of a hero who gave his life in the honorable discharge of the duties which his country called upon him to do. The interment will be attended with honors fitting the true American soldier who has given his life in the defense of his country, details of which will be announced later.

"The deceased died rather suddenly, as expressed in the message received. As the messages of his condition were received by his father from time to time the seriousness of the young sailor's condition was indicated. Relatives had thus been prepared for the sad tidings. The gunshot wound which cost him his life penetrated his chest, abdomen, and spinal column and caused paralysis in the lower part of his body. Had he survived his wounds, it is probable he would have been helplessly crippled for life. From the nature of the wound it appeared that he had been fired on from above.

"William Henry Pulliam was the son of Mr. George Pulliam, of this place, his father coming here from Carroll County, and is now an employee of the General Chemical Co., with which several of the brothers are also connected. He was born about 32 years ago on Maple Street, in the residence now occupied by Dexter Ratcliffe. He was a splendid type of American manhood, a picture of robust health from among the mountains of southwest Virginia. He was one of the eight children—two sisters, Mrs. M. E. Shelton, of Roanoke, and Mrs. C. W. French, of Front Royal, Va.; and five brothers, Joseph, Charles, Robert, and Walter Pulliam, of Pulaski, and George Pulliam, of Providence, R. I. A younger sister died some months ago at Front Royal while visiting her sister. His mother is also dead. He visited home the last time last spring, when he returned to his duties aboard ship after spending his furlough here among home folks.

"He was serving the fourth year of his enlistment in the Navy, and his time would have expired early next year had he lived to that time. He was a fireman of the first class on the battleship Utah. He had risen through his integrity and general ability and attention to duty to the first line on his ship, and his record was a good one, as borne out by the brave spirit with which he met his death. He was fond of the life and would doubtless have reenlisted had he lived, for sea life seemed to have a fascination for him. He met his death in the brave discharge of his duties, and Pulaski, his home town, with his country, will pay the tribute to which he is justly entitled as her citizens gather about the grave which will receive his body when it was returned to his native home to rest."

FRANK DEVORICK.

Mr. VOLLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes about an Iowa seaman who was killed at Vera Cruz.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLLMER. Mr. Speaker, he was only an Iowa boy! His humble home stood on the rolling prairie, amid the waving cornfields of that State. The son of a poor immigrant, his name, Frank Devorick, may sound strange, harsh, foreign, to those who pride themselves on the untainted blue blood of ancient native lineage. But he was an American, and nowhere does the spirit of true Americanism boom with more of its original luster and native intensity than among the descendants of the immigrant in our Middle West. Particularly is this true in the great farming State of Iowa, where the public school has opened the doors of the mind to higher thoughts and nobler aspirations for a greater percentage of the people, as determined by the statistics of literacy, than in any other State in the Union. There, in the heart of the continent, 1,200 miles from the seaboard, the ambitious boy dreams over his schoolbooks of the far-away billowy ocean, "boundless, endless, and sublime," and of some day sailing across it under the flag of his country, the emblem of the highest civilization the world has ever seen. This Government, to his unspoiled mind, is a great beneficent power, whose citizens are sovereign, self-governing free men. His unsophisticated views have not been formed in the debasing environment of one of our great cities, with their machine systems of political control, where the omnipotent boss gives the lie to democratic pretensions and the people lose their faith in republican institutions. But out there on the prairie they still have the original notion of the thing, pure and undefiled, and hence whenever the country calls, they respond joyously with the flower of their young chivalry. There you will find the splendid brain and brawn, pulsing with love of country, so pure and so powerful as to raise ordinary men of common clay to the spiritual heights of consecration.

When the day of wrath shall come and the teachings of the fathers shall seem all but submerged under the engulfing tide of socialism and anarchism; when the mob of great metropoles, the Huns and Vandals of the future, shall lay iconoclastic hands on the pillars of the established order; when American patriotism shall seem dead under the assaults of Utopian visionaries who despise and condemn love of native land, you will find out on the farms of the Middle West the reserve supply of the Republic. [Applause.] Thus we find this Iowa boy, who never saw the army of the discontented trailing after the red rag of revolution, enlisting whole-heartedly under the beautiful starry banner of his country, whose every fluttering fold speaks to him of liberty and glory as no other flag on earth can speak, and gladly offering his young life for it—one of the first to make the sacrifice—far from his prairie home, on the burning sands of the palm-fringed shores of the Spanish Main at ancient Vera Cruz. But when I think of this boy dying down there, Mr. Speaker, though I honor and have attempted to pay a feeble tribute to the glory of the sacrifice, I can not help saying that I wish that Mexico were in hell rather than that hell in Mexico should continue to take from us an increasing toll of such precious young lives. As for the humble name of Frank Devorick, it takes its place among the names of American heroes forever enshrined in the Valhalla of a grateful Nation. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARNHART. I have three privileged resolutions that I would like to submit this morning, because those interested in them are present, and I ask unanimous consent that whatever time is taken in the consideration of these resolutions may be added to the time for general debate on the pending pension appropriation bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I will ask unanimous consent that the time consumed before we go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall be added to the time allowed yesterday for general debate on the pension appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. This time will not be taken out of the time for general debate.

Mr. MANN. But the time was limited to a certain hour.

Mr. BARTLETT. The order is that general debate shall close at 4 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under the impression that the order was for so many hours. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that whatever time is consumed before we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the pension bill shall be added to the time, so that the general debate may be extended that much longer after 4 o'clock.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, is the extension of time to start from this moment?

The SPEAKER. No; it is to be considered as having begun at 12 o'clock to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES, BROOKLYN NAVY YARD, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER announced as the committee on the part of the House to attend the exercises to be held at the navy yard in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Monday, May 11, 1914, in honor of the men of the Navy and Marine Corps who lost their lives at Vera Cruz, Mexico, Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. MAHER, Mr. CALDER, Mr. LOGUE, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, Mr. THACHER, Mr. DEITRICK, Mr. SABATH, Mr. DALE, Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire, Mr. WILSON of Florida, Mr. WALSH, Mr. WALKER, Mr. DONOHOE, Mr. DUPRÉ, Mr. GOLDFOGLE, Mr. WITHERSPOON, Mr. DOOLING, Mr. SLEMP, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. VOLLMER, with the understanding that if Mr. WALKER does not reach Washington in time to go, Mr. BARTLETT shall take his place on the committee.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 489 (H. Rept. 647).

Resolved, That there shall be printed as a House document 1,000 copies of revised hearings before a subcommittee of the Committee on Pensions having under consideration various bills introduced and referred to the said committee for the purpose of pensioning the survivors of the Indian wars that occurred after the late Civil War.

Mr. MANN. I make this suggestion to the gentleman: This resolution provides that there shall be printed as a House document 1,000 copies. The ordering of anything printed as a House document carries with it the printing of 1,300 and odd copies. I suppose what the gentleman wants is 1,000 extra copies for the use of the committee, or the Members.

Mr. BARNHART. We talked that over, and the gentleman who submitted the resolution [Mr. KEATING] was entirely satisfied to take 1,000 copies.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but he will not get 1,000 copies. The printing of a House document means, I think, that the House gets 300 copies, the Senate 200 copies—I do not remember the exact number—and that the remainder go to the depositories scattered throughout the country, a certain number to the departments, and so forth.

Mr. BARNHART. The committee fully realized that at the time we considered the resolution; but this is simply to include something which was omitted from the print of the hearing.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Why not print it as a House document, and print 1,000 additional copies?

Mr. BARNHART. The purpose of reprinting the matter was that it affects very largely the soldiery of the West who fought in several Indian wars. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. HOWELL] had some remarks to submit to the committee, but at the time of the hearings he was absent and did not return until the hearings were closed. What he wanted to say and has submitted is of importance to the committee and to the country generally, and the committee has asked for a reprint, which they could not have except by a simple resolution, and the cost will amount to $19.50.

The SPEAKER. Does either the gentleman from Illinois or the gentleman from Indiana wish to offer an amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out "1,000 copies of" and insert the word "the," and add to the resolution the following: "One thousand additional copies for the use of the House."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution, page 1, line 2, by striking out "1,000 copies of" and insert the word "the," and add to the resolution the following: "One thousand additional copies for the use of the House."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MILITARY POLICY OF UNITED STATES IN MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution and ask for its consideration.

House resolution 493 (H. Rept. 648).

Resolved, That there be reprinted as a separate document, for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 copies of chapter 15 of the Military Policy of the United States, by Gen. Emory Upton, entitled "The Military Policy of the United States during the Mexican War," being pages 195 to 222, inclusive, of Senate Document No. 494, Sixty-second Congress, second session; 1,000 copies of the same to be distributed through the folding room of the House and 2,000 copies through the document room of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain the resolution?

Mr. BARNHART. This refers to some comments on our military policy in the old Mexican War.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is supposed to be its present value?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am the author of the resolution. It proposes to reprint a chapter from a public document entitled "The Military Policy of the United States," by Maj. Gen. Emory Upton, a distinguished officer of the Civil War, and the author of "Upton's Tactics." After the close of the war he made a trip around the world to study the military systems of Europe and Asia. The document from which this chapter is to be reprinted is considered by all military authorities to be one of the greatest works ever issued on the subject of American military history. Unfortunately the general died before he could complete the chapters relating to the last two years of the Civil War. The entire work should be studied by every Member of Congress, because it treats of our wars from a totally different viewpoint than that of the ordinary historian.

The particular chapter that I desire to have printed deals with the Mexican War. It gives the instructions to the military commanders prior to the war and other interesting details. It gives a summary of the military legislation passed by Congress during the war and the effect of that legislation. It shows the evil of short enlistments. An act of Congress provided for enlistments for 12 months, and the result was that when Gen. Scott arrived about halfway between Vera Cruz and the City of Mexico terms of service of about 4,000 of his men expired, and he had to wait a solid year until new troops were recruited and sent to him before it was possible to capture Mexico City. I am sure that every Member of the House will read this extract with great interest. I must confess that the first time I read it I found the entire work more interesting than any novel.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman thinks that this special chapter may be of special value in the present situation?

Mr. HAYDEN. We can only judge the future by the past.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DRAINAGE SURVEY, RED LAKE RESERVATION.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

House resolution 481 (H. Rept. 646).

Whereas Congress by act approved June 30, 1913, authorized a drainage survey of the diminished Red Lake Reservation in Minnesota to be made, together with an estimate of the cost of such drainage project; and

Whereas such survey and estimate has been made by the Department of the Interior and a report thereon prepared: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the report of said survey, with illustrations, be printed as a public document, and that 500 additional copies be printed for the use of the House document room.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that it be printed as a House document and not a public document.

Mr. BARNHART. If it were printed as a house document it would make a saving of 1,351 copies.

Mr. MANN. It will be entitled a House document.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "public" and insert the word "House."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How was this survey made, under what authority?

Mr. BARNHART. Under the authority of the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why is it not printed by the Interior Department?

Mr. BARNHART. I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota. It never has been printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why does the department not print it?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not understand why.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should the congressional allotment for printing be charged with the expense of printing for the Department of the Interior?

Mr. MANN. Because the House Members want it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is we are having complaints about the cost of printing. The gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Printing, brings in this resolution putting the cost of departmental printing on the congressional allotment. There will be no end to it.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that sometimes, where an investigation is made and the department does not care to have it printed for their use and Members of the House desire them for their use, Congress should print it. In this case the gentleman from Minnesota has a live matter before the House, and he wants this document in connection with it for the use of the Members of the House. There are a lot of these drainage propositions before Congress, and this document is for the benefit of the Members of the House, for all of the Members of the House interested in the proposition.

Mr. BARNHART. The Committee on Printing tries to check these matters. In this case there is a demand for the publication. The expense of the survey has been incurred and the result of it is a matter of general importance and a matter of public benefit. The cost of the item is $135.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Department of the Interior gets nearly half a million dollars for printing every year. Because some Member of Congress has an interest in some particular document it will not print the result of its investigations out of its own appropriation, but will leave it to the resource and activity of the various Members of Congress interested in the matter to get the printing done at the expense of the allotment for printing for Congress. In that way our printing expenses increase very largely, and the department augments its appropriation by unburdening its work at our expense.

Mr. BARNHART. I fully appreciate the statement of the gentleman from New York, but there are exceptions. If the gentleman from New York will be on hand when the general printing revision bill is up——

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the time to stop it is now, not when that bill is up, because there is not much prospect of that bill coming up.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure that this appropriation ought to be stopped. I think it is a perfectly just request or I would not have reported it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not make the Department of the Interior pay for it?

Mr. BARNHART. The Department of the Interior said it could not furnish them when I inquired of them, and I had to let it rest at that. I had no means of compelling the department to furnish them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is only about two months to the first of the fiscal year, and that department will then have its new appropriation and could print the report then.

Mr. BARNHART. These ditches are liable to run dry before that time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the general debate on the pension bill will be limited, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to 4.35 o'clock p. m.

PENSIONS.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15280, the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, with Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma in the chair.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair please inform me how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has used 2 hours and 1 minute. The gentleman from Minnesota has used 1 hour and 11 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]. [Applause.]

[Mr. DIES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, although I differ with my Democratic friends on the question of levying duties on foreign imports for protective purposes, I do not impugn their motives. I only claim they are misguided in judgment. All men wish to see our people prosperous, our factories and farmers successful. Republicans believe our success largely depends upon a protective-tariff law to bring prosperity to our people. The Democratic Party believes in a tariff for revenue only, or free trade. I claim both parties can not be correct in their contentions. I am sincere in my opinion and believe the Democrats are sincere.

The people of this country are divided into three distinct divisions. About one-third of our people live in the rural districts—the farmers. About one-third belong to the laboring classes and about one-third to the professional classes—doctors, lawyers, ministers, business men, and such like. Any measure enacted into law that discriminates against the first class mentioned—the agriculturists—is wrong. The farmers produce the bread and butter for all the people. No doctor, no lawyer, no minister, can live on his library. They depend on the farming class to furnish the necessaries of life—food supplies. I say any law that discriminates against the farmers of this country, who are the bone and sinew of the Nation, is neither equitable nor just, and is an assault upon American prosperity.

The Democratic Party is in full power in national politics and is making laws in keeping with their teachings. Many laws of importance have been and are being made by that party which are directly in opposition to principles laid down by the Republican Party. The Democrats are not in power by having received a majority of the votes cast at the last general election, for they received something like 2,450,000 less than a majority. Their being in power was occasioned entirely by a family row in our own party, due to the high regard entertained by some of our people for Mr. Roosevelt. That family row so divided us that the power to legislate was thrown to our opponents.

This country has never prospered under Democratic free-trade rule. Free trade or tariff for revenue only brings foreign labor and foreign products in competition with American labor. Such laws can not lift up degraded labor in foreign countries to a level with the American standard of living, but certainly brings American labor down toward the level of the cheap labor of other countries with whom we must compete.

Over 60,000,000 people live directly south of the United States in the 13 Republics of South America. Each one of these Republics exists under a distinct and different form of government. The Guiana Republics, for the past 400 years controlled by England, France, and Holland, find their people of the laboring class, on account of their free-trade laws, receiving but 30 cents per day, not including board. Chile, a country of low tariffs and export duties, finds her common people in poverty, receiving but 24 to 30 cents per day in gold, not including board.

However, some of these South American Republics have high protective tariff laws, and their manufacturing industries and laborers are prosperous. In Brazil, with high-tariff laws, the scale of wages is as high, if not higher, than in the United States.

China and Japan, free-trade countries, find their common people in poverty and degradation. In short, free-trade countries the world over all have a low standard of wages and living for their common people, and high-tariff countries are correspondingly prosperous. This should be sufficient evidence that the Republican policy of protection is the only one under which the people of the United States, as a whole, as well as capital, can or will be prosperous.

What is the policy of a man who believes in free trade or tariff for revenue only? It is to give American markets to people of lands across the sea and their beneficiaries—the importers; to put the American mill owners out of business and the American wage earners out of employment, in order that he may buy, in foreign countries, articles made by cheap labor, when such articles could and should be made by American labor, enjoying the American standard of living and wages.

A Democratic Member of the House from Illinois, who took a prominent part in the framing of the agricultural schedule in the Underwood tariff law, boasts, so I am informed, that at this early date under the new law we have imported large quantities of Argentine corn. Certainly the importation of Argentine corn is detrimental to the welfare of corn growers in the United States. Argentine corn for the past few months has supplied the Corn Products Refining Co. and the National Starch Co. Both of these companies, if my information is correct, are owned by the Standard Oil Co. A very charitable act, indeed, to help the Standard Oil Co., to the detriment of the farmers of the United States—quite in keeping with Democratic policies.

Our farmers can easily meet competition with other nations of the world, if they are willing to get down to that nation's scale of wages, but such a proposition is a gross insult to American freemen. However, Secretary Redfield, a member of the Democratic administration's Cabinet, boasts that importations of meat have increased from 865,000 pounds during the last three months of 1912 to 33,500,000 pounds for the last three months of 1913 under free trade. Mr. Redfield, I say, boasts of that fact. Our cattle raisers, when going to the polls to vote, will undoubtedly remember that boast.

The farmers of the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota produce large quantities of potatoes annually, yet our Democratic friends are boasting of enormous importations of foreign potatoes. No doubt, when our farmers go to the polls to vote next fall and in November, 1916, they will remember that boast.

In framing the Underwood tariff law the authors thereof evidently had in mind but one class of people in the United States—the consumers, who are not producers of agricultural or manufactured products, forgetting that no consumer can consume unless he obtains employment to obtain money with which to purchase. In framing and enacting this law our Democratic friends have made it possible for labor across the sea to find added employment, and to have increased purchasing power, while thousands of our consumers are walking the streets, without employment or purchasing power, and consuming in a most meager manner.

Lower tariff means increased importations of foreign goods and greater exports of gold to pay for the same, all of which is most disastrous to the prosperity of the people of the United States.

Our Democratic friends know full well that each and every panic that ever existed in this country was largely due to heavy importations of products of the farm and the factory and heavy exports of gold to pay for the same, leaving us without gold and with a surplus of farm and manufactured products, with a depressed market in which to sell.

The following article recently appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer and is an excellent explanation of some of the disadvantageous effects of the free-trade theory and the benefits of protection to American capital and labor:

My only capital is my muscle, energy, and integrity, and, being a cripple, I am often handicapped in the race for bread. But there is red blood in every vein and artery in my body and a heart that throbs for every worker, but especially for the wage earner.

To all these I submit a few facts that will help to see what our tariff legislation threatens. The biggest glass company in the State—Pennsylvania—owns very large works in both this country and Belgium. The company pays workmen in the United States three times the wages it pays in Belgium to the same number of workers for the same grade of work. But it pays three times as large dividends in Belgium as it pays in this country on the same amount of investment.

Now, cut out the protective duties on glass and which body of workers would be employed to make the glass for America? The work will go to the foreigner and idleness and soup houses will be our portion. In Pittsburgh there are 16 plate-glass companies, 21 bottle works, 14 window-glass works, and 10 lamp-chimney, electric-globe works, etc.

The glass company referred to made 80,000 tons of glass in this country in 1911, the raw material for which was soda ash, coal, gas, arsenic, lead, colors, lumber, nails, etc. When the order for 80,000 tons of glass came in an order for 40,000 tons of sand went to four States and an order of 40,000 tons of soda ash went to three States. When the order for soda ash reached their works an order went to limestone quarries for 20,000 tons of lime rock and to salt works for 20,000 tons for salt and to coal mines for 10,000 tons of coal; then to the works to make the soda ash to be delivered to the glass works, thus employing an army of workmen at American wages to work in stone quarry, salt plants, coal mines, soda-ash works, on railroads; then in the glass works, to say nothing of the lumbermen, sawmills, clerks, etc.

Now, throw out of employment the glassworkers of Pittsburgh alone and down along the line of all above plants goes the crash. Upon each busy glassworker depends a half dozen workmen for wages.

Suppose these idle men knock at the door and ask for work. Work or starvation must come. Then the man who knows it all appears, and his answer is: "Men, what you want is the initiative, referendum, recall, etc." Don't think of starving mothers, wives, and children when you can think of such great questions as I am dreaming about. What say you wage earners? Shall we be duped by dreamers while our wages are paid to toilers beyond the sea? There are two ways to prevent this—one is to cut our wages; the other is to restore protective duties by returning to power the Republican Party. After we succeed we may listen to those who are dreaming.

Mr. MANN. Sure.

Mr. FORDNEY. It can not truthfully be denied that a majority of the people of the United States are in favor of protection to American industries and labor, for, although the party in power candidly believe in free trade or a tariff for revenue only, they are not in power by having received a majority of the votes cast at the polls in November, 1912.

No one will deny that the votes cast for Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt in that election were cast by people who believed in the policy of protection, and the votes cast for the Democratic and Socialistic candidates combined fall far short of a majority of the votes polled. Therefore it can not be claimed by the friends of the Underwood tariff bill that this law has been placed upon our statutes at the request of a majority of our voters.

The Socialists do not even believe in levying a tariff for revenue purposes. They want free trade on imports, and they also want a division of all property held by our people. They can not be considered as being in sympathy with either the Democratic or Republican policies, for they are not. That there has been a sentiment among many of our people for a change of some kind will not be denied. For the past several years a great many agitators have been at work stirring up discontent. Some of these men I credit with being sincere, but a great number were at work solely for the purpose of gaining personal political favor. It is easy to criticize, but difficult to suggest practical changes to better conditions. When a man is in straitened financial circumstances it is easy to influence him by argument that a change of some kind will be beneficial to him, for he feels he has nothing to lose and everything to gain. This agitation undoubtedly aided in putting the Democratic Party in control at the last general election.

During the past 10 years or more the cost of living has materially increased, but up to 1913 employment has been plentiful and good wages have been paid—higher wages than ever before—and during no period of our history have the laboring men been better clothed, better fed, or enjoyed more of the comforts of life. We passed through a period of low prices under a free-trade law from 1894 to 1897, but employment was scarce, and many had little or no purchasing power, and there was much suffering and hardship. That period of low prices and hard times has been forgotten by many. In fact, it is shown by statistics that about 51 per cent of the people who voted at the general election in 1896 are now dead, and that hundreds of thousands of the voters of to-day were but 5 years of age in 1896 and know nothing of the conditions that existed under the Wilson tariff-for-revenue-only measure, or free-trade law, from 1894 to 1897, which caused such widespread suffering and shrinkage in values. The necessaries of life reached bottom prices known to this country, yet, as before stated, the country never knew a time of greater suffering and distress among our poor people, a condition so absolutely reversed from 1897 down to 1913.

In the campaign of 1896 our Democratic friends claimed we did not have enough money in the country with which to do the business of the country, and that if we had more and easy money prices of all commodities would advance, which was so much desired at that time. The contention of the Republican Party was that it was not so much more money that was required as it was a restoration of confidence and the exclusion from our markets of the products of cheap labor from abroad, and a preservation of our home markets for our manufactured and agricultural products.

At that time we had $22 per capita in circulation, but now our Democratic friends claim, although we have $35 per capita in circulation in the United States, that we need more money and easier money to bring down prices, and to substantiate this theory they point with pride to the currency law recently passed. They believe that measure will cure all our financial ills. We all agree that more easy money would add to our prosperity, provided our people were furnished with employment, but this can only be done by preserving American markets for the articles we can produce in this country. It is impossible to bring prosperity by inviting greater importations of foreign competitive products at low prices, thus closing the doors of our factories and displacing American labor for the employment of cheap labor of foreign countries.

Seventeen years have elapsed since our last experiment with free trade and low tariff, and many have been led to believe their incomes have not increased in proportion to the cost of living and that low prices are desirable. Generally speaking, everyone has something to sell—it is either his labor or a product of labor. It is equally true that everyone has to buy. If all could get better prices for what they have to sell and have lower prices on what they have to buy, it would be an ideal change, but the absurdity of such a proposition is self-evident, for we must buy and sell to one another. However, many, ignorant of conditions under former periods of low prices, or closing their eyes to those conditions, have been led to believe that prices can be lowered without a corresponding decrease in wages and employment. In 1896 we claimed we needed a party in power during those panicky days that would bring confidence to the people and bring out of hiding the money we had and put it in circulation, and we made this argument then and succeeded, and had the greatest measure of prosperity from 1897 to 1913 that any people in any country under the sun have ever enjoyed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

My Democratic friends, one thing in which I believe I am right, and you will agree with me, is that you who live south of the Mason and Dixon line are natural-born free traders. It comes as nature to you. When the 13 Colonies formed into a Union and adopted a Constitution the people of this country soon became divided in their views on the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to impose on foreign imports a tax sufficiently high for protective purposes. The people were divided into two classes, called "loose constructionists" and "strict constructionists." The strict constructionists were free traders, who contended the Constitution gave Congress no right to impose a tax on imports greater than would yield a sufficient sum of money to pay the running expenses of the Government. The loose constructionists were protectionists. George Washington and Alexander Hamilton and others who helped frame the Constitution took the view of the loose constructionists, that the Constitution of the United States did give Congress the right to impose a duty on foreign imports not only for the raising of money to pay the running expenses of this Government, but to protect the industries of this country against cheap foreign labor.

John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, Secretary of State in 1824, was chosen President by the House of Representatives in February, 1825. Each State having one vote, 13 States voted for Adams; 7 for Jackson, of Tennessee; and 4 for Crawford, of Georgia.

The Adams and Clay factions were protectionists, or so-called loose constructionists, and when put into power passed a tariff act in 1828. The southern Members of Congress were almost a unit for free trade or tariff for revenue only.

South Carolina, on November 19, 1832, at a State convention held at Columbus, declared the tariff acts of 1828 and 1832 to be "null and void" and no law, and not binding upon that State, and declared she would not permit the collection of duties on imports into South Carolina and threatened secession, and only yielded after President Jackson issued a proclamation, December 16, 1832, warning that State against such action, and followed up his proclamation by sending a naval force to Charleston Harbor and provided guards for the customs officials, thus ending that secession controversy and tariff dispute.

In the Southern States slavery was lawful, and the people there were chiefly engaged in raising cotton. With slave labor, the cheapest labor in the world, they could compete in the production of cotton with any country in the world. They wanted cheap manufactured products and cheap foodstuff for their slaves, and were frank and open in opposition to tariff protection for the factories of the North, claiming the people of the North should turn their attention to agricultural pursuits, which would enable the South to obtain a ready and abundant supply of foodstuff for the slave labor at the lowest possible cost. They also contended that by free trade manufactured articles could be obtained from abroad at a lower price than at home under a protective tariff. Knowing Europe must be looked to as a market for the major portion of their cotton, they realized the possibility, under free trade, of exchanging cotton for cheap European manufactured products.

In the campaign of 1844 James K. Polk, a candidate for the Presidency, was accused of being in favor of a tariff for revenue only—a polite term for free trade. To offset this accusation, Polk and his friends issued a letter and published it broadcast over the country. In part, it was as follows:

> James K. Polk has ever pursued a straightforward and consistent course upon the tariff, as well as upon other questions of national policy, and he is now most decidedly and unequivocally committed in favor of a tariff which shall afford fair and just protection to agriculture, manufacturing—

And so forth.

This letter satisfied the so-called loose constructionists, or more properly called protectionists, and Polk was elected, and George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania, an avowed protectionist, was elected Vice President.

Congress met December 1, 1845. The Democrats, or strict constructionists, were in the majority in both branches of Congress. The President's message condemned all antislavery agitation, recommended a subtreasury, and a tariff for revenue only. At that session of Congress, on July 30, the tariff act of 1846 was passed by a party vote. It followed the strict constructionists' theories of establishing rates of duties sufficient only to provide revenue for the Government, without regard for protection. On one tie vote in the Senate, Dallas cast the deciding ballot and voted for free trade. President Polk signed the bill—the so-called Walker Tariff Act—and that act resulted in the loss of our balance of trade. With the exception of a single year during the life of the bill our imports exceeded our exports, as the following table explains. The balance of trade against the United States averaged $34,000,000 for 10 years.

Balance of trade of the United States from 1847 to 1857.

Year.	Excess of imports over exports.	Excess of exports over imports.
1850	29,133,800
1851	21,856,170
1852	40,456,167
1853	60,287,983
1854	60,760,030
1855	38,899,205

Our Democratic friends have ever since claimed that we had a period of prosperity due to that bill. Gentlemen, they are mistaken. We did have prosperity, but it was not due to the tariff law at that time, because that law brought a balance of trade against us every year that it was upon our statute books, except the first year after its adoption. Gold was discovered in California, and we had war with Mexico, and there was war in Europe, all of which created a great demand for the products of this country. We produced somewhere from fifty to one hundred million dollars a year of gold, and it kept the Treasury of the United States from running dry in paying our foreign debts. The strict constructionists came back into power in 1856 and adopted a measure giving much more free trade than was provided in the Walker tariff law, and the panic of 1857 ensued.

It is interesting to observe how history is repeating itself. In the campaign of 1912 President Wilson in public utterances assured the people of this country, if elected President of the United States, he would injure no legitimate industry. I heard many protectionists during that campaign say they would vote for Wilson because of his publicly announced friendliness to protection. They were misguided, for, like Mr. Polk in 1844 and 1845, President Wilson, after committing himself to protection, has signed a bill for free trade, or tariff for revenue only. President Wilson, after nearly three score and ten years, has followed in the footsteps of Polk.

If I am correctly informed, President Wilson, while the convention at Baltimore was in session, assured the people of Louisiana he would not in the least injure the cane-sugar industry of the South; but we see to-day a tariff law on our statute books, signed by President Wilson, which will eventually place sugar on the free list. Sugar mill after sugar mill in the State of Louisiana is going into the hands of receivers.

I again say, history is repeating itself after lo these many years. Wilson has followed the footsteps of James K. Polk, who, over his own signature, in the letter above referred to, befogged the minds of the people of the United States, from whom he was then seeking support.

President Polk, in his message to Congress of December 2, 1845, said, in regard to the tariff:

> The attention of Congress is invited to the importance of making suitable modifications and reductions of the rates of duty imposed by our present tariff law. The object of imposing duties on imports should be to raise revenue to pay the necessary expenses of the Government. Congress may undoubtedly, in the exercise of a sound discretion, discriminate in arranging the rates of duty on different articles; but the discrimination should be within the revenue standard and be made with the view to raising money for the support of the Government. * * * Taxation, direct or indirect, is a burden, and it should be imposed as to operate as equally as may be on all classes in the proportion of their ability to bear it. To make the taxing power an actual benefit to one class necessarily increases the burdens of the others beyond their proportion and would be manifestly unjust.
> The terms "protection to domestic industry" are of popular import, but they should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer or the planter who toils in his fields is engaged in domestic industry and is as much entitled to have his labor protected as the manufacturer, the man of commerce, the navigator, or the mechanic. * * * The joint labor of all these classes constitutes the aggregate of the domestic industries of the Nation, and they are equally entitled to the Nation's protection. No one of them can justly claim to be the exclusive recipient of the protection, which can only be afforded by increasing burdens on the domestic industries of the others.

President Wilson, in his message which he read in the House of Representatives Tuesday, April 8, 1913, said:

> We have seen tariff legislation wander very far afield in our day. * * * The object of tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition with whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world. * * * We must build up trade, we need the outlet and the enlarged field of energy more than we ever did before. We must build up industries as well as adopt freedom in the place of artificial stimulation only so far as it will build up, not pull down.

And, gentlemen, you from south of the Mason-Dixon line believe in a tariff for revenue only, which is nothing other than free trade, because it does not make any difference what amount of duties you put upon an imported article, if it is below the point of protection it cripples the industries of this country and is equivalent to free trade. If you are going to drown me, it makes no difference whether you put me 10 feet under water or 10 inches, just so long as there is enough water to cover my head you are going to accomplish your object. And it makes no difference how low you put the duty, whether it is absolutely free or below a protective point, it is free trade and means disaster to the institutions of this country.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. FESS. I think for the sake of the record, with reference to 1844, when James K. Polk was elected upon that promise, you ought also to state that he defeated the greatest protectionist the country ever knew—Henry Clay.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. Gentlemen, my time will be too limited to give you the full extent of my argument along this line, but I want to impress upon you the fact that a Democrat votes for free trade because that theory is instilled in him. He was born a free trader, brought up on free-trade doctrine, and will not be shown the error of his way.

During the campaign preceding the last general election the Democratic Party, among other things, pledged itself to furnish ample employment and reduce the cost of living. They are now in power; they have placed a tariff law on our statute books, and the results of their efforts are beginning to be shown. I am most firmly convinced reduced wages must and will accompany lower prices, and from reports rapidly coming in the number of unemployed is increasing at an alarming rate. It appears if low prices are in store for us low wages and lack of employment will reach us first, and that lack of purchasing power will to a large measure be responsible for depressed prices, if depressed prices come.

The argument of the man who believes in free trade or tariff for revenue only is made solely from the viewpoint of a consumer. He loses sight of the fact the consumer's income may be affected. He forgets there are two sides to the argument. Let us see whether his position is logical or whether there is substantial ground for argument.

For example, he believes if a suit of clothes can be produced in England or any other foreign country and furnished to the consumers in this country at a lower cost than similar clothes can be manufactured in this country, that we should encourage the purchase of such clothes from abroad and let the consumer have the benefit. He uses the same argument in connection with other articles of consumption in this country which can be produced abroad cheaper than at home. In answer to that theory permit me to say I have on my back a suit of clothes of medium quality, and in the converting of the cloth and trimmings into the finished product labor received $17.50. If this suit of clothes had been made in England, by labor receiving but 40 per cent of the wages paid for the same class of labor in the tailor shops of this country, it would deprive our labor of just that much employment and correspondingly reduce their purchasing power. The same applies to all labor in this country engaged in producing anything that can be produced more cheaply abroad. That labor must turn its attention to other pursuits, which could not be found to take care of all, and that labor would join the great army of unemployed and to a large measure would be compelled to live—partly, at least—upon charity.

By purchasing abroad we would open up new shops and factories in Europe and increase employment in foreign countries, and, as was the case under the Wilson bill from 1894 to 1897, we would quench the fires under our furnaces and close the doors of our factories and place signs thereon, "No labor wanted." Signs of that character were conspicuous in every town and city in the land during those days, but were removed from 1897 to 1913. They are again being displayed, and in increased numbers, in every city, and many of our laboring men are seeking employment.

As the beet-sugar industry and the cane-sugar industry in this country expanded the refiners of foreign imported sugar, the Sugar Trust, started a campaign for a removal of import duties on sugar. The matter has been constantly before Congress for several years past. With the aid of the Democratic Party, the Sugar Trust has at last won its fight. By the passage of the Underwood tariff law the Democratic Party has condemned the domestic sugar industry to a slow but certain death. This law made some reductions in the duty on sugar to take effect March 1 and provided, further, that after May 1, 1916, all sugar should be admitted free of duty. It is so evident the sugar industry can not survive free trade that certain insurance companies have canceled their policies of insurance on sugar factories, so I am informed, in the State of Louisiana. Formerly it was comparatively easy to borrow money on the property of a sugar company. To-day such a loan is considered unsafe, and we now see cane-sugar factories in the States of Louisiana and Texas, one after another, passing into the hands of receivers or closing their doors. Other factories have reduced the price to be paid to the farmers for beets. The result is to enable the Sugar Trust of the country to monopolize more of the trade.

Is the Democratic Party ignorant of the fact the sugar industry will be injured? As evidence of the fact that they realize injury will be done I wish to call attention to the fact that in the Agricultural appropriation bill there is a large appropriation of money—$50,000—to be used in educating the people of the cane fields in the South in other pursuits. Such an appropriation is made at the expense of the people and in the interest of the Sugar Trust and no others.

It is and always has been my contention that the prosperity of this Nation depends primarily upon a protected home industry by adequate tariff rates on importations of foreign competitive products. So much has been said concerning the tariff that it is considered by some a threadbare subject. It is my experience, though, that those who call it a threadbare subject are mostly free traders. It is also my experience that calling the tariff threadbare is the only way many free traders can reply to a statement of tariff facts. The tariff has always been the great Democratic stumbling block.

It is my desire to call attention to a few startling facts from which an open-minded man can draw but one conclusion in regard to the effect of low-tariff legislation. Since the adoption of the Underwood tariff law I have diligently studied the advance reports from the Department of Commerce regarding our foreign trade. I have watched the daily Treasury statements and the reports from our foreign consular officers, and I have endeavored to get expressions from American manufacturers as to business conditions, and I will attempt to present the facts and figures to you in concise and concrete form as I proceed.

Gentlemen, the most effective way to destroy the comforts of life and the enjoyments of a good home and a high standard of living for the laboring classes of this country is to vote to bring into this country the products of cheap labor when employed across the sea.

Something was said here not long ago about child labor. I want to show you something in that regard, and I ask you to bear with me. I will be as brief as possible.

The following appears from Consul Edwin S. Cunningham, of Bombay, India, in the Daily Consular and Trade Report for June 24, 1912:

> The employment of women and children in factories is of considerable importance; 43,401 women and 10,816 children were so engaged in 1910. An analysis of the statistics shows that during the last five years the number of women employed in the city of Bombay has gradually decreased, being 25,093 in 1906 and 22,288 in 1910, while in the country districts there has been a gradual increase—19,617 in 1906 against 21,113 in 1910. On the other hand, the employment of children in the city of Bombay has been growing, from 2,741 in 1906 to 3,942 in 1910. In the country, in the former year, 5,918 children were employed and in the latter 6,874.

The following is taken from the Daily Consular and Trade Report of April 16, 1913, from the report of Consul General T. St. John Gaffney, of Dresden, Germany:

> In former days the German wage-earning woman was, as a rule, only to be found in agricultural districts, but now they are forsaking country life in increasing numbers and are going to the cities, where great industries are springing up and demanding their labor. The number of women wage earners in Germany is now larger than in any European country, and from census reports it appears that it is steadily increasing.
> In 1882 the women employed in occupations other than domestic service numbered over 4,000,000; 25 years later the figures stood at 8,000,000; and while the employment of men has increased 20 per cent during the same period, at present a full third of the economic labor of the Empire is being carried on by women. Statistics recently published show that there are 9,500,000 wage-earning women in Germany, which means that nearly every second adult woman is earning her own living and directly contributing to the wealth of the country. There is no doubt that to their work is largely due the wonderful industrial advance made by Germany, which is one of the most remarkable features in recent European history.
> The fact that women compete with men in many of the great industries is now accepted as a matter of course. This large army of women wage earners is gradually awakening to a realization of its importance, and it is claiming rights and privileges which have hitherto been asked for only by men. In 1906 there were no less than 37 women's trades unions, comprising nearly 119,000 members.

The following appears in the Daily Consular and Trade Report for January 13, 1914, from Consul George Nicholas Ifft, of Nuremberg, Germany:

> For the purpose of fixing the rates for the imperial sick, accident, old-age, and disability insurance systems, the district insurance officers all over Germany are required to establish by careful investigation at stated intervals the average wages paid for unskilled labor in the cities and rural communities of their respective districts. The investigation recently completed for the city of Nuremberg, one of the important manufacturing centers of Europe, with a population of 355,000, shows the daily wages paid to male and female laborers in specified age groups as follows: Over 21 years of age—male, 88 cents; female, 50 cents; between 16 and 21 years of age—male, 71½ cents; female, 45 cents; under 16 years of age—male, 43 cents; female, 31 cents. These rates mark an increase of about 9 per cent over 1910, when the average wage of an adult unskilled laborer in Nuremberg was 81 cents per day.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In what country are those wages paid?

Mr. FORDNEY. Germany.

The following is taken from the report of Consul General A. M. Thackara, of Berlin, in the Daily Trade and Consular Report for July 15, 1913:

According to the statistics of 1907 (the latest official figures), the proportion of men and women employed in the metal-working industries in Germany is as follows:

	Men.	Women.
Helpers and workpeople:
16 years and over	580,097	60,558
14 to 16 years	79,970	9,118
Under 14 years	2,895	470
Apprentices:
16 years and over	56,888	528
14 to 16 years	60,519	1,663
Under 14 years	2,003	240

Remember, gentlemen, that under free trade the products of that labor come into competition with the products of labor in this country.

Here is another report showing the employment of women in the woolen and cotton mills of Germany. In the cotton mills, where there is a large amount of child labor employed, the wages to the average cotton-mill employee is 64 cents a day. In the woolen mills the wages run from 40 cents to 64 cents a day.

My Democratic friends, you have put wool on the free list. You have put a 35 per cent ad valorem duty on manufactured woolen goods. That duty is below the protective point, and before I conclude I will show you the amount of importations of woolen goods.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. POST. The gentleman just made the statement that we had placed raw wool on the free list. I will ask is it not a fact that raw wool in Michigan and Ohio brings a higher price to-day than it brought one year ago or two years ago?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know, my friend, whether the price is higher or not. I think it is about the same.

I do not know whether this claim is correct or not. It is claimed, however, there is a shortage of the world's supply of wool, but that claim is made by the importers of wool. But I am going to ask the gentleman a question. On the 1st day of December, when this law took effect, putting wool on the free list, wools of the first class paid 11 cents a pound duty and wools of the second class paid 12 cents a pound duty and wools of the third class paid from 3 to 7 cents a pound, owing to the value of the wool. The market value of wools in this country did not change one fraction of a penny, but the foreigner took that money formerly paid as duty and put it in his pocket, and the Treasury of the United States is being deprived of from twelve to fourteen million dollars a year duty which was collected on wool last year. The foreigner is getting it, and the consumer here is not. Can the gentleman tell me how that happens? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POST. Can the gentleman explain to me how the foreigner gets the duty when there is no duty collected?

Mr. FORDNEY. Before the Underwood tariff law took effect, before wool went on the free list—on the 1st day of December last—I say the duty on wool of the first class was 11 cents a pound, and at that time foreign wools were selling in Philadelphia at 23 cents a pound. Before the duty was removed, when the foreigner at that time brought his wool to this country and sold it for 23 cents a pound, he paid 11 cents out of that 23 cents to Uncle Sam for the right to dispose of his wools in our markets; but since the 1st day of December, 1913, he takes that money home with him—the entire 23 cents, my friends. Can the gentleman tell me why?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If my colleague's position is correct, that the prices have gone up, what becomes of the argument they adduced that the cost of living would come down? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and I want to call the gentleman's attention to another argument.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just one moment. Let me answer a little further. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] to this fact, and no man has given a satisfactory explanation of the cause: When the Payne tariff bill was enacted into law hides were put on the free list. Up to that time hides had paid a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem. Hides were selling at 10½ cents a pound on January 1, 1909, and 10 months later, after being placed upon the free list, hides sold for 17½ cents a pound. Can the gentleman tell me what caused this rise in price on hides?

Mr. POST. I happen to be a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which investigated the Shipping Trust, and it was proven conclusively in the hearings had before that committee that the Shipping Trust increased the rates of freight equal to the tariff.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, I believe that is a mistake. I have a statement of the rates of freight on wool from every principal city in this country west of the Mississippi River which I will give; also, the freight on wool from Australia and New Zealand, and from South America and from Europe, and none of the freight rates exceed 2 cents per pound from the point of production to Boston, which market is the great wool market in the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] to state that the Shipping Trust added that much to the freight when we reduced the tariff on certain things, and I assume he takes the position that they took the tariff off for the benefit of the Shipping Trust. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. POST. My remarks applied to hides.

Mr. MANN. Very well. According to the gentleman's position, we took the tariff off hides for the benefit of the Shipping Trust. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell my friend from Ohio [Mr. POST] what was the cause, in my opinion. When the duty was taken off hides, it was notice to the world that the United States was short of a hide supply for our tanneries, and the people who had hides to export to the United States took advantage of that notice and put up their price, and were benefited thereby.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted to suggest that if the gentleman from Ohio is correct, he not only gave the tariff to the Shipping Trust, but his party also gave that trust a subsidy of 5 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and their Attorney General has now declared that law is unconstitutional. I thought it unconstitutional when they passed it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Upon that point, if the gentleman will permit me, ever since this administration has been in power there have been at least three suits that I know of, begun under a former administration, against shipping combines and shipping trusts, and this administration has made no progress, so far as I am able to ascertain, in the prosecution of those cases, and taken no steps toward doing so. What is the reason?

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not know of those lawsuits.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I should like to inquire whether or not the imports into this country are brought over in American ships or in foreign ships, and whether it is an American subsidy or a foreign subsidy.

Mr. POST. We have no American ships.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; we have, although they are very few. But before I finish I am going to show you, Mr. POST, what your party said in your platform about aiding American ships, and you will run with shame for the cloakroom.

Mr. POST. I assure you I will not scud to the cellar.

Mr. FORDNEY. You will admit that your President can shift his position mighty quickly, if you do not run.

I have here another consular report, which states the average wages paid in Germany in the cotton and woolen mills is $132.09 per year to the average laborer—adult and child labor combined—and $122.33 per year in France. Yet you, my Democratic friends, have voted to remove the tariff and bring into this country the products of that French and German labor in competition with the products of American labor, that receives from $1.50 to $3 or $4 a day.

Mr. POST rose.

Mr. FORDNEY. Pardon me just a moment.

Now, let us see, my friends, what France thinks about a protective tariff. France imports our cotton free of duty. We produce 60 per cent of all the cotton raised in the world. There is no duty on raw cotton going into France, I say; but if you or I were to take into France the finished product of one bale of cotton made into knit goods we would have to take along the value of 11 bales of cotton at the present price—15 cents per pound—to pay the duty on the manufactured product of 1 bale of cotton. You do not believe in placing a protective duty upon the finished product of cotton coming back into this country from abroad. Cotton raised in this country and exported to Belgium, where labor receives 15 to 30 cents a day, is coming back here in millions of dollars' worth of manufactured cotton goods, brought into this country from Belgium, Germany, France, and England, and sold at a price that will compete with us and even undersell us, because your Democratic tariff upon imported cotton is below the protective point. I call your attention to some imports, as follows:

NOTEWORTHY INCREASES IN LEEDS EXPORTS.

(Consul Homer M. Byington, Leeds, England.)

[From the Daily Consular and Trade Reports, Apr. 29, 1914.]

The quarter ended March 31 clearly demonstrated the effects of the recent changes in the United States tariff upon the export trade of Leeds. The increase in shipments is noteworthy. The total exports to the United States for the quarter were $613,388, as compared with $297,259 for the corresponding quarter of 1913. Leather shipments increased from $47,507 to $211,138, salted hides from $176 to $13,898, rags from $1,748 to $44,547, shoddy from nil to $18,681, woolens and worsteds from $4,672 to $33,763, traveling rugs from nil to $20,877. During the quarter 589 invoices were certified, as compared with 243 in 1913 and a total of 1,047 for the whole of the year 1913.

The above figures are from official sources, and show increases of imports that leave no doubt as to what the Underwood tariff law is doing to industries employing large numbers of American working men and women. This money paid for increased imports would have furnished employment here for 197,232 people, at $50 per month, for one month.

[1] Square yards.

March shows the largest increase in imports of wool and manufactures of wool under the Underwood law as compared with the same month in the previous year under the Payne law.

If this money paid for wool and woolens had been kept at home, it would have given employment to 130,000 people at $50 per month for one month.

President Wilson has stated publicly that he would injure no legitimate industry. I take it he meant that through his political action he would injure no legitimate industry; that he would sanction no law harmful to our industries. I wish to ask: Does anyone know of any new factories being built in the United States due to encouragement given in the Underwood tariff law? President Wilson sanctioned that law. Do you know of any additional employment given to our laborers? Do you know of any additional happiness or prosperity coming to our people? Do you know of any people enjoying greater prosperity through the effects of this tariff act? Yes, we know of such added prosperity, but where is it? It is in Europe, not here; and the statistics I have just given are proof of this assertion. Both English and Irish papers, with glowing headlines, teem with encouraging editorials to their people: "Cheer up, laborers and business men; we see a rift in the dark clouds that have hung over the western horizon for lo these many years. The Democratic Party in the Congress of the United States has removed the barrier; they have torn down the Republican protective-tariff wall and have bid us a welcome. We can now find a market in the United States for much of our products, which market for the past 18 years has been practically closed to us."

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. In the gentleman's judgment, how many men are there out of employment in this country by reason of the Underwood tariff law?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am going to reach that in just a minute, and I will detail it.

Mr. POST. Does the gentleman know that throughout the entire corn belt the farmers can not get labor at all, even at the very highest wages?

Mr. FORDNEY. If you will just be patient, I will show you where you can find plenty of unemployed people.

Mr. POST. If there is an army of unemployed, why is it that the corn-belt farmers can not get help?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They are raising corn in Argentina now for the United States.

Mr. NORTON. Would the fact that the price of corn has been so greatly reduced within the past 12 months probably have something to do with the fact that the farmers are not able to employ help?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; there is much in that statement.

Mr. POST. Does not the gentleman know that the farmers——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] that every day for the last month I have received letters from people asking me to find them jobs, and saying they were thrown out of employment by the Democratic administration. I will refer them to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST].

Mr. FORDNEY. Fifteen minutes before I came on the floor of the House I was importuned by a poor person who was out of money and out of everything to eat, who said he would have to camp in a dry-goods box to-night unless given aid.

Mr. BOOHER. I should like to ask my friend from Washington a question.

Mr. FORDNEY. Ask it of me, not of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to have you ask the gentleman from Washington if the people he refers to were Republicans whom the Democrats have turned out of a job?

Mr. FORDNEY. It does not make any difference whether they are Republicans or Democrats; they are out of a job, and you put them out.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I got a letter from one of them who said he was a Democrat in the last election, but that he would never vote the Democratic ticket again.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman vouch for his previous Democracy?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Was not that letter written because he thought that was the best play he could make in writing to the gentleman?

Mr. FORDNEY. I can not tell you what is in Democrats' minds. Here I have another consular report from Germany. Average weekly wages of arms and ammunition workers: Polishers, $11.65; turners, $11.65; drillers, $8.03; ammunition drillers, $10.21; helpers, $6.67; laborers, $6.69; and the weekly hours of work are from 52 to 56 hours. Sixty thousand women and children are employed in these ammunition factories in Germany, many of them under 13 years of age, at very small wages.

Mr. Redfield said in a speech which he made at Wheeling, W. Va., on February 23, 1914:

> But there is no ground here now for worry. The surplus of freight cars has ceased to grow. It commenced about the middle of January to decline, and has decreased by about 5,000 cars. I have found in the last fortnight the reports of improving business so many and so general that it has been impossible for me to consider them all. Argentine beef is being shipped to New York free of the tariff tax, and this has resulted in a decline in the wholesale New York market for beef of about 4 cents a pound.

Is that encouraging news to the cattle growers of the United States?

> Butter has been reduced in price by the large recent importations of that food. The importations of Argentine corn has, during the recent winter, operated at least to prevent a rise in the price of corn in our Atlantic coast cities, if it has not directly reduced the price in those cities.

What comfort can Mr. Redfield get out of the fact that because of his party's action he has taken the bread and butter from the mouths of the very people that support him in his present position? It is the people of the United States he should aid through legislation. The value of farmers' products has been decreased. Is there any glory in that sort of an argument for our producers? If so, I want him to have it all; I do not want any of that kind of glory.

Now, how about idle cars? Is Mr. Redfield correct? I have an official statement furnished me on the 22d of April of this year, which says there were 70,000 idle cars on the 15th of April, 1913, and 213,000 idle on the 15th of April, 1914.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And it is growing.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is growing—81,000 idle cars added to the number in a single month, from March 15 to April 15 of this year.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman expect it would make any difference in the statement of Mr. Roseyfield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know as to that. For several years past it has been the attitude of the Democratic Party that a low tariff or free trade would greatly increase our export trade; that manufactures required free raw material to meet foreign competition. Secretary Redfield made a speech in May, 1913, while the new tariff law was being considered in Congress, in which he said:

> The day of industrial fear is passing.

He also said:

> We have shaken off the shackles of real industrial slavery to enter the arena of free competition, strong, athletic, and vigorous, in which our business will be stronger and safer and in which we shall be happier than before.

Secretary Redfield in December pointed with pride to the great balance of trade of the United States for the year 1913—nearly $700,000,000—and made glowing prophecies for the future.

Oh, where is it now? Where is Redfield? Adopting an expression recently used in the Senate, he is "under the ammunition wagon" so far as this kind of argument is concerned.

Gentlemen, our balance of trade in our favor since 1897 has averaged under a Republican protective-tariff law about $45,000,000 to $50,000,000 a month, or in the neighborhood of $600,000,000 a year for all these years. Under this Underwood tariff law there is no fair comparison to be made except since the 1st day of March, and for this reason: Although that law took effect on the 3d day of October last, wool did not go on the free list until the 1st day of December. Manufactured woolens did not go on the free list until the 1st day of January, 1914. The duty on sugar was not reduced until the 1st day of March. So that March of this year is the only fair comparison of exports and imports under this law as compared with our Republican tariff law. Our balance of trade for the month of March fell off to $5,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Four million eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. FORDNEY. Four million eight hundred thousand dollars. I thank the gentleman; I was speaking in round numbers. The importations for the month of March included $111,000,000 worth on the free list and $70,000,000 worth paid duty; 62½ per cent of all our imports were on the free list.

Gentlemen, I want to point out to you some of the Democratic inconsistencies in reference to the employment of child labor abroad. I have here a letter from the American consul at Bradford, England, Mr. August E. Ingram, dated April 22, 1914. I wrote him asking him to give me some statistics as to the employment of child labor in the factories of England, and here is what he said in part:

> The annual report of the juvenile employment committee—their first report—has, among other things, some interesting tables; while the three pamphlets or handbooks in regard to (1) the woolen and worsted trade, (2) the engineering trade, and (3) the professions, give, especially the first and second, some of the very statistics that you wish. I also send you a copy of the report of the Bradford education committee for the year ended July 31, 1913, which, on page 71, gives the number of so-called "half-timers"—that is, children who, having reached the age of 13 and being in a certain prescribed standard or grade, are permitted to work half time at some employment, attending school the other half of the day. The number of such half-timers in Bradford is, according to the latest return, 5,161, while the total for England is, according to a recent newspaper statement, 70,255. Bradford is said to head the list of all cities in the country for half-time or child labor, the spinning mills apparently finding their labor most desirable, although various automatic doffing mechanisms are now on the market.
> There is at the present time a bill pending in Parliament amending the law in respect to the employment of children and their attendance at school. As yet, I have been unabe to learn much about it beyond various statements in the newspapers. Among other things, I read that in Scotand half-time labor does not exist, and the bill also proposes to follow Scotland's example in establishing compulsory attendance at evening schools. I also read that at a meeting in London on child employment it was stated that children 3 or 4 years of age were employed sewing or linking hooks and eyes on cards; 5 years old were employed fitting covers on boxes; and there were thousands of children but a few years older than this in Birmingham, Nottingham, and the East End of London, who are regular wage earners.
> At a conference of the Workers' Educational Association (northwestern district) held recently in Bradford, Mr. Frederic Keeling, of London, who was introduced as the leading authority on the question of the employment of children, said in the course of an address that 2,250,000 boys and girls under 18 years of age were working for wages in this country. Of these about 240,000 were children attending school full time and working out of school hours, as milk boys, newsboys, street traders, etc. In regard to "blind-alley" employment, he said that 300,000 or 400,000 boys were working at jobs in which they would not be wanted after reaching the age of 16 or 17 years.
> Mr. Keeling has just issued a very complete historical account of the attempts to restrict and regulate child labor in the United Kingdom; and in view of your interest in the matter I have ordered a copy of it and will send it to you by the next mail.

And yet you Democrats remove a protective tariff and encourage the importation of the product of this foreign cheap child labor employed in Europe, but continue to claim you are a friend of labor in this country. Are you consistent? You are an enemy of our laborers by your action in this matter.

On the 28th of April Mr. Ingram again wrote me, and he gives me the employment of children, taken from statistics furnished by the English Government. In part, he said:

SIR: I now beg to give you the following statistics taken from Volume X, Part II, of the series of Official Blue Books, tabulating the results of the 1911 census of England and Wales, issued last December:

1. As to the number of males and females from 10 to 16 years of age engaged in occupations, which includes domestic service:

	Years.				Total.
	10-13.	13-14.	14-15.	15-16.
Males	21,583	75,561	222,854	278,275	598,270
Females	10,243	39,033	133,217	193,285	375,778

2. The total number of males and females of all ages engaged in occupations was given as follows:

Males	11,453,665
Females:
Unmarried	3,739,532
Married	680,191
Widowed	411,011

3. The total number of persons occupied and unoccupied was stated as follows:

	Males.	Females.
All ages	17,445,608	18,624,884
Under 10 years	3,783,408	3,767,771
10 years and upward	13,662,200	14,857,113

The statistics of occupation for the textile manufacturers of England and Wales are as follows:

	Ages.				Total.	Total of all ages.
	10-13.	13-14.	14-15.	15-16.
Males	8,169	14,167	17,035	15,974	55,345	400,474

The wages paid in Europe and in the Orient run from 20 to 88 cents per day, and yet my Democratic friends have voted to remove the duty on cotton below the protective point, so that it will bring into competition with American labor the products of labor receiving that rate of wage.

I am going to show you now what the effect has been. Here is a statement furnished to the Ways and Means Committee one year ago by a firm that has factories and manufactures mohair and alpaca goods in this country, and also at Bradford, England. The one located in this country is at Greystone, R. I. I shall not undertake to detail the wages paid, but they give the comparative wages for the different classes of labor in both their factories. The gentleman who furnished it was here to appeal to this Congress to maintain upon those goods a protective tariff, otherwise his firm would have to close their factory at Greystone, where they have a million and a half dollars invested, and furnish us with the articles they produce in Bradford, England. Their wages averaged in England 40 per cent of the wages paid by them at Greystone, R. I.

I have here a list of certain articles that were imported during the month of March—cotton, dress goods, lining, yarns, silk, wool tops, oils, sheepskins, carpets, mohair; and several other things are included. During March, 1913, under the old law there were $800,000 worth of these particular goods imported, and under this law, in March, 1914, there were $3,083,000 worth imported, or an increase of importations of $2,283,000 for one month alone. The money sent abroad to buy this great increase in importation at $50 per month would give employment to 45,660 people here at home one month.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In referring to the increase in the importations the gentleman means simply on those specific articles?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield long enough to enable me to read a dispatch from San Francisco which appeared to-day?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Here is an Associated Press dispatch:

SAN FRANCISCO, May 8.

The steamship Benefactor, due here from the United Kingdom in 10 days, is laden with 11,950 boxes of tin plate.

No other extensive importations of tin plate have been made since the institution of the tin-plate industry in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that industry shows 650 per cent increase in importations in one month.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman has enumerated the increase in the various articles, and the increase in some of them has been very large. Can he tell the membership of the committee wherein, if any, there have been any reductions in the retail prices of these various articles?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know of any reductions, but I will tell the gentleman what the duty on tin plates was under the Payne tariff law. It was $1\frac{2}{10}$ cents per pound, or $1.20 a hundred pounds. Under this new tariff law the duty is 15 per cent ad valorem, and when valued at 3 cents a pound, with 15 per cent ad valorem, the duty collected amounts to 45 cents a hundred pounds as against $1.20 under the old law, and if tin plate was selling at 4 cents a pound, 15 per cent ad valorem would be six-tenths of a cent per pound, or 60 cents a hundred pounds, which is one-half the duty under the Payne tariff law. That reduction of duty has brought the duty down below the protective point, and we are now consuming Welsh tin instead of having tin made in our factories in this country. This low duty permits the importation of foreign tin plate.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I was trying to find out from the gentleman how much, if any, of the promised reductions had been made to the consumer.

Mr. FORDNEY. None that I have heard of to the ultimate consumer. Leather goods, gloves, paper manufactures, manufactures of silk, vegetables, wool and woolen goods, and so forth, show in the total of all of these articles an average increase in importation of 64.2 per cent. The importations for the month of February were $25,198,000, as compared with $15,000,000 last year, or an increase in importations of $9,861,000. We sent that much money abroad to buy an increased quantity of those goods over the amount we sent out last year for the same purpose; and if that increased exportation of money had been kept at home and given employment to American laboring men, it would have furnished employment, at $50 per month, for 197,232 men one month. We will find enough unemployed by and by, so that the gentleman from Ohio can get some men for his farm, I guess.

I received a letter on April 23, written by Mr. Gary, president of the United States Steel Corporation, in reply to a letter I wrote him to find out business conditions with that company. He very kindly gave me a complete statement of the number of men employed and the wages paid and the percentage of business done by his company compared with the total capacity of their factories since the organization of that company in 1901 down to date, and the lowest amount of their output produced in any one year was 74 per cent of their total capacity.

On the 15th day of April they had 29,000 men less in their employment than they had on the 1st day of October last year; 29,000 men at $2.96 a day who are out of employment in that one company alone. The United States Steel Co. produces 44 per cent of all the steel produced in the United States, and if other steel factories of this country laid off a proportionate number of men, then there are 65,000 men out of employment in the steel industry who were employed on the 1st day of October, 1913.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There are some farm hands.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is some more labor, my Democratic friends, for your farms. Gentlemen, the amount of money paid, $2.96 a day for the labor of 65,000 men, amounts to $5,070,000 a month which is not now getting into circulation.

Now as to leather goods. The importations of leather goods under the old law were $9,638,000 in six months of last year, and under the new law during the corresponding six months of this year $13,814,000, an increase of $4,176,000, which is the added money that was sent abroad by our people to pay for leather goods made by foreign labor; and if that money had been kept at home and given to American laboring men it would have employed 13,925 for six months at $50 a month. Some more laborers for your farms, my Ohio friend. Now as to the glove industry. The Democrats reduced the duty on ladies' gloves from $2.25 per dozen pairs to $1 per dozen pairs; men's gloves, $4 per dozen pairs, were reduced to $1 per dozen pairs. This has caused an increased importation in six months of $1,125,000 worth of gloves, and if the laborers of this country had been given that money it would have furnished employment for 3,752 people for six months at $2 a day, which is about the average wages paid in the glove factories. Now in regard to cotton, my friends. Cotton importations for five months increased $2,600,000 in certain grades.

The labor employed in cotton mills receives about $1.50 a day in the North and less than $1 a day in the States south of the Mason-Dixon line, and if this money had been kept at home it would have furnished employment to 13,000 people at $1.50 a day for five months. We import what is known as sea-island or Egyptian cotton, and we convert that raw material into the finished product in this country. We import it because it is a high-grade cotton and fine goods are made from it to better advantage than from our domestic short staple cotton. Last year we imported $12,539,000 worth of raw sea-island or long staple cotton and converted it into the finished product with American labor, and the value added by manufacturing was more than equal to the cost of the raw material. There is no import duty on raw cotton, but you, my Democratic friends, reduced the duty on the finished products of cotton to such an extent that this year we imported only $6,031,000 worth of raw cotton, a falling off of $6,508,000. It is now being converted into the finished product by cheap labor abroad, because you reduced the duty on the finished product to a point so low that cheap labor abroad can produce it and bring it into this country at a less price than we can make it at the American scale of wages. If your party had not reduced the duty on the finished products below a protective point, this $6,508,000 would have employed at home at $1.50 per day 32,540 people for six months. I guess you can get enough laborers for your farms out of that number.

Mr. POST. The gentleman is overwhelming the farmer.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am telling the gentleman where he can get laborers for his farm. Now, when you compare conditions in England and in the United States in regard to the conditions of labor this is what you will find, and it is good evidence that we have been more prosperous during recent years under the protective policy than they have been in free-trade England. The census of 1910 shows we had 64,000 paupers in almshouses in this country, and in Yorkshire, England—where Bradford is located—the greatest manufacturing center, perhaps, in the world, there were 78,000 paupers in that one county alone, according to the English census of 1911. And in all England, where there are but 32,000,000 people, compared with our ninety-odd millions, there were 883,000 paupers. We have three times their population. Is not that evidence that the laboring class of that country has not been as prosperous as in this country? I think it is. It was stated by one gentleman who appeared before our committee last year—Mr. Parker, who is president of 16 cotton factories in North Carolina and South Carolina—that the cotton mills of this country could compete with the world. I asked Mr. Parker if it was true that labor in the cotton mills of the North received a higher standard of wages than was paid in the South in the cotton mills, and he said it was not.

I consulted the Tariff Board report and the census report and found this startling condition: In the cotton mills of South Carolina and North Carolina the wages averaged 86 cents a day, while in the cotton mills in the North Pennsylvania paid the highest wages of any cotton mills in any State of the Union, and the average rate north of the Mason-Dixon line was $1.42 a day. Therefore the labor in the cotton mills of North Carolina and South Carolina received, according to the reports of the Tariff Board and the census report, 58 per cent of the wages paid for the same class of labor in the cotton mills of the North. Of course, Mr. Parker, of South Carolina, could live under free trade where the cotton manufacturers of the North could not.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir; if you will be brief.

Mr. POST. Is the tariff responsible for the difference in price paid to those employed in the cotton mills of the South and the cotton mills of the North?

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not say that at all. But I do say this: When Mr. Parker, of South Carolina, makes the statement that he can manufacture and compete with the cheapest labor in the world it should be remembered he pays but 86 cents a day to his laborers, whereas in the North wages are $1.42 a day; and any man that would ask for legislation that would curse his neighbor and not permit him to live is nothing more nor less than a cannibal.

Importations of corn, oats, breadstuffs, potatoes, butter, animals, and eggs into this country are rapidly increasing, on account of the Democratic tariff law, as the following table shows:

Comparison of importations of seven leading agricultural products during six months of the Payne tariff law (October, 1912, to March, 1913) with six months under Underwood tariff law (October, 1913, to March, 1914).

Products.	Payne tariff act.	Underwood tariff act.
Corn	$141,617	$5,705,786
Oats	26,434	6,494,484
Breadstuffs	7,820,409	24,208,106
Potatoes	131,606	1,524,216
Butter	173,926	1,460,950
Animals	4,896,054	15,409,879
Total	13,190,046	55,623,479

Increased importations, $42,433,433.

If this $42,433,433 had gone to American labor, it would have given employment to 176,806 men at $1.50 per day for six months.

The farmers of this country are going to remember you and the compliments you paid them when they take pencil and ballot in hand and go into the booths next fall. [Applause.] If they do not, they are bigger fools than I think they are. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYPOOL. There is quite a discrepancy between wages paid in the North and in the South——

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. And I wanted to ask, for information, how the gentleman accounts for that condition. Of course he can not account for it, as I understand the gentleman, on the protective-tariff theory; so how does he account for it?

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, it is a mighty difficult question to solve, but I will say this: Myself and business associates are employing men in the lumber woods in the State of Mississippi, and also in the State of Washington, on the Pacific coast, at the same kind of labor. On the Pacific coast we pay an average of $3.26 a day, and in Mississippi we pay an average of $1.77 a day. Can you tell me why that difference in wages should exist? The duty on lumber is measured with the same yardstick for the State of Washington as for the State of Mississippi. But the difference exists, and no human being can tell why.

Mr. GORMAN. Are the men in either of those sections identified with labor organizations?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir; they are not.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. The gentleman knows that the same difficulty as to difference in wages exists between Europe and America?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the gentleman is mistaken. No such difference exists in any one European country—foreign wages are more uniform. One gentleman asked the question here why labor in free-trade England is higher than in protected Germany. I can give you one instance that may explain this question quite fully—the pottery industry. Abroad the female labor receives from 32 to 36 cents a day and male labor 80 to 86 cents per day. But there is a greater percentage of female and child labor employed there than here. In the South you have negro labor, the cheapest labor found in the United States, and perhaps that accounts for the lower wages paid in the cotton mills of the South.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to say to the gentleman that the negroes do not work in the cotton mills.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; they do. I have seen them. I have gone through cotton mills in the South and have seen them at work.

Mr. BARTLETT. They are employed in menial work. There is one cotton mill in South Carolina owned and operated by negroes, but the negroes do not work generally in the cotton mills of the South. The gentleman is mistaken as to that.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not say on a large scale; but they are employed in the cotton mills at common labor.

Mr. BARTLETT. The question I was going to ask was as to the difference in the people employed in Mississippi and those in Washington. Those in Mississippi are colored people and those in Washington are not?

Mr. FORDNEY. About half of those in the South are white and half of them are negroes—I am speaking of the lumber mills and camps—and between the wages of the negro and the white man for common labor there is no difference in Mississippi.

Mr. BARTLETT. You mean in your business?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir; in our business.

I wish to call your attention, gentlemen, to your Democratic platform——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Everybody knows all about that part you want to quote.

Mr. FORDNEY. You have a plank in your Baltimore platform declaring for free tolls for coastwise vessels going through the Panama Canal, which reads as follows:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal.

Your platform further states:

Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

You now propose to repeal free tolls to our coastwise shipping—at the request of England.

Did you mean what you wrote in that platform? The other day I was out riding with a gentleman, and we went through a beautiful cemetery, in which there was a vault built by a noted man in public life. I said, "Why, that vault faces to the west, and when Gabriel comes from the east, blowing his trumpet, that man will face in the wrong direction." He turned to me and said, "My good friend, that man can change his position and meet Gabriel quickly; he can change his position as quickly and easily as Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Woodrow Wilson, in public speeches delivered in 1912, promised the people of this country that if elected he would injure no legitimate industry. Did he mean what he said? If so, has he carried out his pledge? He signed a free-trade tariff law. You may call it what you please, but it is free trade, because that law has fixed duty rates below the point of protection, and thereby he has endangered or crippled to a very great extent our great agricultural industry of this country. He has also injured every legitimate factory in this country employing American labor.

Go to the lumber industry, gentlemen. There are 800,000 men employed in the sawmills of this country when running full blast, and about 25 per cent of those men are out of employment to-day, or, in round numbers, 200,000 who are idle. The average wage is about $2 a day, making a loss of $400,000 a day to our labor.

The duty removed from lumber alone does not affect that industry. If you had removed the duty on lumber and left it where it was—at a protective point—on all other products, it would not have affected the lumber industry so seriously; but by reducing the duty all along the line you have put out of employment a large number of American laboring men, reducing the value of the property and the products to be turned out and consumed. You have reduced the purchasing power of the people of this country, and all along the line the purchasing power of the people is less to-day than under the protective-tariff law. And it is going to go lower, as I fear, but I shall hope and pray with you that it does not.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Has the reduction of the tariff on lumber reduced the price to the consumer?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not in the retail business, but I was told by a retailer the other day that he had not changed his price to the consumer, although, as a manufacturer, we are selling lumber to-day at our mill in the State of Mississippi at $5 a thousand lower than we sold for in March, 1913.

Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield.

Mr. POST. Are you selling your lumber at a loss now?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, my friend, I will be candid with you. It is a question whether or not we are getting a new dollar for an old one. But there is another feature to be considered: We have 450 men in our employ in the lumber camps and mill. They are performing most faithful service. Those people represent a population of 1,800 or 2,000 men, women, and children.

If we close our mill to-day, where will those poor people turn to seek a livelihood? It is for me and my associates to consider seriously, sir, whether we will close down and throw out of employment those faithful servants, who have stood by us through thick and thin, when we can run without too serious a loss. We can not close our mill without a serious loss, for taxes, interest, insurance, and depreciation and certain overhead expenses continue whether we are closed or running; and it is a question to-day—and I am candid about it—whether or not we are getting back a new dollar for an old one. But we are running and trying to avoid serious loss.

I have a report here from the Home Market Club, of Boston, which club gathers much statistics on the operation of woolen mills, and on the 2d day of March, out of all the mills reporting, 27 per cent of the looms were closed down. There are 168,000 employees in the woolen mills, and 27 per cent means 45,500 out of employment in that industry.

I can go on and show similar conditions existing all along the line. What is true of one industry is true of another. I regret exceedingly that we are not on the crest of a wave of prosperity. Capital can never be prosperous unless labor is well employed and prosperous, and the prosperity of American industries will reflect prosperity on all the people. No legislation should be enacted that will attempt to separate capital and labor. Class legislation is neither just nor equitable. It is contrary to the Constitution of the United States, my friends, to give one man prosperity and not others through legislation. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been used?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the Chair has made a calculation, and after we have evened up the time there remains 1 hour and 13 minutes, so that it will give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] 12 minutes, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] 18 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] 43 minutes to close within the time that the House instructed the committee to close, namely, 4.35.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. All but 18 minutes. The gentleman has 18 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] 12 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] 43 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. BARTLETT. How much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. Three hours and eleven minutes. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] has used 2 hours and 46 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. I recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of some extracts from the speech of Col. George Harvey, editor of the North American Review, delivered before the Merchants' Club of Boston on April 21, 1914, entitled "Defense of the administration."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the publication of the speech indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the speech referred to:

DEFENSE OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

(Extracts from the speech of Col. George Harvey, editor of the North American Review, before the Merchants' Club April 21, 1914.)

The last time I was in Boston I was on a political mission. It was in the summer of 1910 when, on returning from my native State, I met by appointment at the Hotel Touraine a gentleman, Woodrow Wilson, who had journeyed hither from his resting place on the banks of the Connecticut River. So it happened that I came from Vermont and he from Connecticut to this abode of political inspiration in Massachusetts, for the purpose of constructing a party platform for the use of Democrats in New Jersey. We struggled manfully at the task for two evenings, and, since I had comparatively small part in the actual construction of the document, I may say frankly with no little success.

In any case the doctrine enunciated, though anything but reactionary, proved so pleasing to the Jacksonians in New Jersey that I had little difficulty in inducing them to accept it, and in the following September the gentleman who had most to do with putting it into words was delegated to stand behind it as candidate for governor, and in due course of time was, as the current phrase runs, triumphantly elected. Thereupon, after having put those principles into active practice to the great satisfaction of the State, he was called up higher, and at present is shaping the course of the Nation from the Executive Mansion in Washington.

Of our foreign policies under this administration we may say, without undue boasting, that they are such as they are. Our attitude toward Mexico has not, of course, been to the liking of everybody in the United States or to anybody, apparently, in Mexico, except our amiable allies, Mr. Villa and Mr. Carranza. But how, I beg to inquire, could we make it more satisfactory or more consonant with international usage without virtually admitting that we had taken a false step at the beginning, a quite impossible confession, as all must agree. And have we not confounded the critics of watchful waiting by our recent spirited action? Who now, in the face of 40 battleships steaming fearlessly before the frowning guns of the impregnable fortifications of Tampico, can attribute to us a craven spirit? I venture to say that as a result of that splendid maneuver the whole world has awakened to realization of the fact that we could, if we would, fight our way into that ancient village and capture it.

But it is no part of our purpose to utilize the strength of a giant simply because we possess it. We have no eager hope to engage in a bombardment which might conceivably result in frightful carnage through the bursting of a bottle of club soda upon one of our own battleships. To enhance our military glory is not our desire. That is not the problem. To salute or not to salute? That is the question to whose solution is being brought to bear all of the unsuspected resources of our diplomacy. As true Americans, devoted to the cause of peace and forbearance, let us hope and pray that the Mexican Government will not only accede to our gentle suggestion, but, what is more to the point, that it may be able to find somewhere in the vicinity of Tampico a cannon that can be fired 21 times without exploding. Else how can we anticipate that our Secretary of State will ever be able to place upon his brow the laurels of a world pacificator and clasp to his bosom the Nobél prize of $40,000, the equivalent of 80,000 full-paid subscriptions to the Commoner? But it is far from my intention to discuss our variegated Mexican policy at this time. I couldn't do it. I shouldn't know, at the moment, whether to laugh or to cry.

But while our composite democratic mind may at times seem to be closed, it is never really locked. We are always ready and willing to learn. No reasonable person, of course, could have expected us to recognize the de facto government of Mexico after we had once put our heel in the ground in refusal, but you may have noticed that subsequently when precisely similar conditions arose in Peru and Haiti we lost not a moment in according recognition to what was, even though it seemed to our higher thought what it ought not to be, thus disproving conclusively accusations of obduracy and inattention to the demands of expediency. Never again, you may rest assured, shall we fall into the error depicted by Rameses II, when, in giving instructions to the nephew who was to succeed him, he defined the difference between a diplomat and a lady.

"If a diplomat," he observed, "says yes he means perhaps; if he says perhaps he means no; if he says no he is no diplomat. On the other hand, if a lady says no she means perhaps; if she says perhaps she means yes; if she says yes she is no lady." You may be certain that we shall not soon again definitely, inflexibly, and irrevocably negative the designation of a President by another nation. As the colored gentleman about to be hanged remarked, somewhat pathetically, "This experience is going to be a mighty good lesson to me."

So far as our other diplomatic endeavors are concerned, we direct attention to the difference familiar to all between theory and practice. We denounced dollar diplomacy instinctively. The very word "dollar" grated harshly upon our tender sensibilities. We could hardly sleep o' nights while Mr. Knox was making a sordid trade with Nicaragua. And yet when, after having been placed in authority, we listened, as was our duty, to the pleadings of those unhappy neighbors, we not only confirmed the transaction, but voluntarily threw in $3,000,000 to boot as evidence of good faith and kindly feeling, no less than of our own contempt for mere dross, so long as it can be extracted without undue attention from the Treasury of the United States.

So, too, with Colombia. There was a clear case of the pressing need of righting a wrong, and we are doing it or trying to do it after a fashion fully illustrative of our magnanimous disregard of millions. That the injury was inflicted and that reparation should be made there can be no question, but why it is necessary to take $25,000,000 from our taxpayers, when but a few years ago $10,000,000 would have been most gratefully accepted, and to couple with this payment an expression of regret closely approaching an apology for the action of a previous administration, along with the privilege of using our canal free of charge, may indeed seem to some as undue encroachment upon our generosity. So, at least, I am confident it will appear to the redoubtable huntsman whose comment upon his return we await with zestful anticipation.

Now for the tariff. We reformed the tariff not precisely as we reformed our Diplomatic Service, because we reduced it. That is what we promised to do. That is what we were elected to do. The precise degree of that reduction was not fixed during the campaign, and it must be admitted that we went somewhat beyond the terms of the bill which had already passed the Democratic House of Representatives. Some say even now, as Artemus Ward said of Napoleon, that we "tried to do too much and we did it." People in Louisiana who are breaking their sugar machinery into junk and some of the beet growers in the West are talking that way, very much as the farmers voted at the recent congressional election in Iowa. But what of it? We had a principle to sustain and sustained it. The time may come, in fact it seems to be approaching, when we may need the $50,000,000 of revenue so easily derived from the small tariff upon sugar, but if so, we have only to increase the income tax.

It is all quite simple and logical. Mayor Van Wyck insisted that Mr. Devery was the best chief of police New York ever had. And that is our attitude toward our new tariff. If it is not satisfactory from one point of view, it is from another. We Democrats have more than one string to our bow. Granting that the expectations of our optimistic Secretary of the Treasury are not being fully realized, then all we have to do is to fetch forward our ebullient Secretary of Commerce, with his proud assertion that our markets are not being filled with foreign products. In this way we are enabled to establish the soundness of our original contention regardless of the consequences. That is what we call team work. When one prediction fails, another is fulfilled beyond peradventure.

Occasionally we hear remarks of the dearth of employment for workingmen in this section of the country. But there is nothing in that. You manufacturers are very prosperous. You may not know it, but you are. If you have any doubts upon the subject, we will send Mr. Redfield up here, and he will convince you by the exegetical process of reasoning that you are, or at least ought to be, which is the same thing. In any case, according to actual statistics in our possession, nearly 60 per cent of your working people are employed, and surely that is a very good percentage when you consider that you can not enact Democratic measures without expecting to get Democratic results.

The charge is brought against us Democrats that, although having for years professed an ardent desire for economy in the administration of public affairs, we are indulging in extravagance. This is a phase of our administration which for various reasons I do not care to dwell upon in detail. But as a slight indication of the baselessness of the assertion, I would direct your attention to the fact that only the other day the Secretary of State appeared before the Senate Committee on Appropriations and announced with pardonable pride that while he had been conducting the affairs of his department with all the fire and dash of an angleworm, he had reduced the estimated expenditures of his department from $354,160 to $354,040, thus effecting a net saving of $120 per annum. He achieved this reduction, moreover, without impairing the so-called efficiency of his force. Acting under the inspiration of his financial astuteness, by the simple method of dropping a clerk, who had been drawing $900 a year, he was enabled to employ a footman, and added, somewhat pathetically, "You gentlemen, of course, know that you can not get along with a driver alone when engaged in the matter of returning cards." The Senators addressed nodded understandingly and, probably to show their own familiarity with the conventions, granted the allowance. So, too, finally did the House, though with less grace, because Representative GOOD, of Iowa, disliked the appellation "footman" and wished to substitute "messenger who shall act," etc. After Mr. GOOD'S motion had succumbed to a point of order, Representative MURDOCK, of Kansas, objected to the appropriation for "equipment for drivers," which he insisted meant "livery and nothing else," and said emphatically, "I know the Secretary of State; I protest for him; I know the country from which he hails and its customs; we do not believe in that sort of thing out there." Nevertheless, since nobody seemed to know what is considered a suitable costume for a footman where footmen are unheard of and the only cards known are euchre decks, the protest passed unheeded and the appropriation was made with but one condition, that "equipment" should not comprise "skin-tight pants," thus completely demolishing the theory of the Peacham philosopher that "it's not the coat that makes the man, it's the pants."

Mr. DAVIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

[Mr. FARR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CONNELLY].

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, my admiration for some of these distinguished gentlemen who are opposed to old soldiers' pensions is so great and so genuine that I really regret that they take the position that they do regarding these old soldiers, who at best can have but few years to enjoy the largess of a nation's gratitude through the agency of their quarterly pensions.

I wish that I could vote for every dollar appropriated here with as good will and as clear a conception of duty done as I can when I cast my vote for these old soldiers' pensions. Mr. Chairman, I say this as a Democrat coming from a State that has been held in the Republican column for nearly half a century, largely through the influence and the vote of the soldiers of the Civil War. The politicians of my State have for years made every effort to hold this vote by appealing to the prejudice engendered in the war, and trying to make the old veterans believe that they were in danger of losing this stipend that comes to them from the Government should the Republican Party lose control. They have made the matter of pensions a partisan matter instead of placing it upon the high grounds that it should always occupy, that of being a patriotic matter. While a great majority of these old men in my district will to-day be found going to the polls and voting a different ticket from the one that I choose to vote, I may doubt their judgment but I never doubt their patriotism, and they have the right to vote as they desire. I have no respect for any man who views the pension matter from a partisan bias.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that we are far enough this side of the great conflict that was all settled five years before I was born to look at the conditions now without viewing them through the smoked glasses of prejudice. There have been thousands of people who have grown up in my State who have not only believed but they have been encouraged to believe by men who were profiting by the old soldier vote that every Democrat was a rebel and at one time desired the dissolution of this Union. I had three uncles who heard the cry of their country's distress in the dark days of sixty-one. One of those uncles, a beardless boy, fell charging up the slopes at Fredericksburg; the other two came home, and, with honorable discharges, drew pensions until within the last two years, when they have crossed the silent river. They went to the war as Democrats, they came home Democrats, they lived and died Democrats. They believed that the Union should be preserved, but they never faltered in their devotions to the principles of Jefferson or doubted the wisdom of his teachings.

Mr. Chairman, these old soldiers have shown that they were loyal and patriotic, and they have the right to vote as they please, and they have the further right to expect this Government, under the administration of any party, great and rich and powerful as it is, to not refuse them food and shelter and raiment and medicine in their old age, as they totter down the last few years of the sharp decline of life's highway. Mr. Chairman, the lines drawn through the special bills that we have from time to time considered tell the story of the going of some of these old warriors while we are quibbling over a few paltry dollars that they have asked for to make smooth the last end of their journey here. Even while we stop in our deliberations the pontoons of death are heavy with the tread of their marching feet, marching to "Fame's eternal camping ground."

Mr. Chairman, I want to economize, and I know there are many places where it could well be done, but I do not want to begin at the expense of these old men, their wives and their widows. I would like to go back to my district and tell my people that this Congress had been careful with the people's money, but I do not want to say that we saved a dollar by taking it from the men who went down into the valley of the shadow when the lamp of the Nation's life flickered and all but went out. I want every soldier to know that this Nation has not forgotten and will not forget. I want him to know as he sits in the gloaming, in the twilight of the eventide, as he sits there in retrospect, as he nears the end of life's tollsome way—I want him to know that this Nation is not unmindful, is not ungrateful. I want this Nation to be just and, if you please, generous to these old men and their widows. I want this because I believe it their due, but I want it for another purpose as well.

I want the boy of the future who is just budding into stalwart manhood, if he should ever hear the blast that calls him to the defense of his country's flag—if he should say at that time, "Take my measure for a suit of the blue"—I want him to feel that in case he ever needs a few paltry dollars when he is old and poor and sick and discouraged, that this Nation will not be grudging in the granting. I am ready to stand by the side of the gentlemen here who are opposing the civil-service pensions for the men who have held good offices all their lives and who have drawn ample pay for the services they have rendered. It took no patriotism, no devotion, no sacrifice to accept the job and assume the responsibility. I want to be counted against that pension; but in every case where the committee finds that one of these old and decrepit veterans needs a few more dollars to tide him over the remaining span of life they can have my vote for him to have it. Some gentlemen have gone to the trouble to figure out that each one of the special pension bills sets the Nation back $8,000. I have not the figures at hand, but I suppose they are in the main correct. If we pass 10 of these bills, the total will aggregate $80,000 per year, or nearly 1 mill for each voter in the United States. Mr. Chairman, I want to be economical, but I do not want to save one-half of 1 cent for every family of five in my district at the price of ingratitude to these old men, their wives, and their widows. There is no class of people in this great Nation that is demanding it; there is no party nor creed who want it done. In the few years that he has yet to live under the friendly folds of the flag that he followed as his pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night let the old soldier vote the way he wants to vote, but let him understand that no vandal hand shall touch the little stipend that he draws in the shape of a quarterly pension from the Government upon whose altar he placed his all when the clouds of war hung low.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, we have before us to-day for consideration the annual pension appropriation bill, providing funds for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1914, and ending June 30, 1915. This is one of the largest appropriation bills that receives consideration and action by Congress each year. This time it contains an appropriation for the payment of annual pensions, and fees for examining surgeons, for the year mentioned in the sum of $169,150,000.

It has always been a pleasure to me during my short career in this House to support by my vote the annual pension appropriation bills and other special bills providing pensions for the old soldiers and sailors, their widows and dependent children. This general pension appropriation bill I shall also with pleasure support and vote for. Observations and statistics show that there is a smaller percentage of pension appropriations wasted or misused than there is of any other Government appropriations of equal size. Experience and observation also show that there is no money appropriated by the Government which carries so much happiness and joy to the homes of our citizens as does the annual pension appropriation bill. No money appropriated by the Government is so equally distributed and kept so constantly in circulation. Of all the money that Congress annually appropriates none is so cheerfully and gratefully voted by the average Congressman, and none does as much substantial good among the people. These annual millions are divided, subdivided, and distributed among 860,294 pensioners upon the Nation's roll of honor.

ROLL OF HONOR.

The statistics for the last previous year indeed show it to be a roll of honor. In the annual distribution of these millions for pensions there is less waste and less fraud than in the appropriation and distribution of money by the Government for any other purpose. As evidence of the honesty, integrity, and honor of the old soldiers, their widows, and dependent children, let me present official statistics. It is shown by the records of the Pension Bureau for the year ending June 30, 1913, that only 61 new cases for that year were presented by the bureau to the Department of Justice for prosecution on account of offenses against the pension laws. Where, I ask you, can there be found another 860,294 citizens with so little dishonesty and practicing so little deception and fraud? It shows us conclusively that honor and good character are precious to the old soldiers and sailors and their widows, and that they fight as valiantly to maintain and preserve untarnished the honor of their citizenship as they valiantly fought and battled for the honor and preservation of the Union; and yet some of our southern friends have the audacity to charge that the pension roll is not a roll of honor. Such indisputable facts prove conclusively that it is a roll of honor with a splendor not excelled by even the interior splendor of the Congressional Library, said to be the greatest splendor in the world.

CLASSES OF PENSIONERS.

Of the 820,200 pensioners on the roll at the close of the year ending June 30, 1913, 503,633 persons rendered service in the Army or Navy of the United, including 328 Army nurses, the remaining 316,567 being pensioned as widows and dependents. The number of individuals who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the Civil War is estimated at 2,213,365.

The survivors of the Civil War on the roll on the 1st of July, 1912, numbered 497,263. These survivors at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1913, were, by death, reduced in number to 462,379, or a net loss during the year among the Civil War veterans of 34,834. This amounts to an annual reduction in the ranks of those heroes of 7¼ per cent.

WIDOWS OF CIVIL WAR SOLDIERS.

On the 1st of July, 1912, there were 232,947 widows of Civil War veterans on the pension roll. On the 1st of July, 1913, there were 232,864 such widows on the pension roll, being a net loss of 83 during the last year.

WAR WITH SPAIN.

On the 1st of July, 1912, there were on the pension roll 23,841 survivors of the War with Spain, and 24,157 on the 30th of June, 1913. On the 1st of July, 1912, there were on the pension roll 2,931 widows of Spanish War soldiers, and at the end of that year there were 2,860 such widows on the roll.

The greatest number of pensioners ever carried on the rolls of the Government was 999,436 in the year 1902. The total amount paid in pensions for that year was $141,335,646.95. The greatest amount of pensions ever paid in one year was in the year 1913, when the Government expended for that purpose $176,714,907.39. It seems paradoxical that during the year 1913, when there were 179,246 less soldiers, widows, and dependents on the pension roll than in the year 1902, that the amount of pensions paid in 1913 should be $35,379,050.44 larger than in 1902. An explanation, however, is simple and is due exclusively to the increase in pensions for Union soldiers provided for by the Sherwood age and service pension act, which became a law May 11, 1912.

The following table shows the total amounts paid for all pensions and the number of persons on the pension roll between the years 1902 and 1913, inclusive.

WISCONSIN CIVIL WAR SOLDIERS.

During the year ending June 30, 1913, there was paid to 19,176 soldiers, their widows and dependents, residing in the State of Wisconsin, $4,199,038.08. In the amount of pensions paid to citizens by the Federal Government, Wisconsin ranks eleventh among the several States.

SPECIAL ACTS.

Since 1861 there has been allowed by special acts of Congress 42,337 pensions and increases of pensions, of which 22,016 are now on the roll, with an annual face value of $6,699,096. Only a part of this is properly chargeable to special acts, as most of the beneficiaries had been previously pensioned under general laws at lower rates.

From June 30, 1912, and thereafter, during the Sixty-second Congress, 2,871 persons were included in the special acts passed at the rates specified in the summary following:

Pensions granted by special act during the Sixty-second Congress, subsequent to June 30, 1912.

Rates specified.	Number granted.	Rates specified.	Number granted.	Rates specified.	Number granted.
$100	3	$20	398	Inoperative:
$50	98	$18	6	$50	8
$46	1	$17	6	$40	4
$45	2	$16	32	$36	9
$40	116	$15	20	$30	33
$36	164	$14	2	$24	16
$30	972	$10	15	$16	4
$25	16	$8	9	$12	4
$24	518	$6	7	Total	2,871

Since 1899 the different Congresses have passed the following number of special pension acts during each Congress:

	Special acts.
Fifty-sixth Congress, 1899–1901	1,391
Fifty-seventh Congress, 1901–1903	2,171
Fifty-eighth Congress, 1903–1905	3,355
Fifty-ninth Congress, 1905–1907	6,030
Sixtieth Congress, 1907–1909	6,600
Sixty-first Congress, 1909–1911	9,649
Sixty-second Congress, 1911–1913	6,350
Total number of special acts passed by Congress in 14 years	35,546

It is impossible at this time to tell the exact number of special pension acts which will be passed during this session of Congress, but to me it appears that such acts are being passed, at least as liberally as during the Sixty-second Congress subsequent to June 30, 1912, when the Sherwood Pension Act was in force. The reason why the number of special pension acts passed by this Congress will not be as great as in the Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, and Sixty-first Congresses is because of the liberal provisions of the Sherwood General Pension Act taking care of thousands of needy and destitute soldiers whom it otherwise would have been necessary to have taken care of by special pension acts. The ravages of age and disease, however, are naturally working with great havoc and rapidity among the old soldiers and sailors. Nearly all are now incapacitated from performing manual or other labor, and a large portion of them, like the rest of mankind, have been unsuccessful in laying aside provisions for a rainy day, and the number who are in needy and destitute circumstances is rapidly growing. It will therefore be absolutely necessary to continue until the last soldiers have answered the final bugle call the practice of passing special pension acts by Congress granting relief to those who may be in the most helpless, dependent, and destitute circumstances. Of course there are many persons in and out of Congress who complain of the increased liberality necessary in the future to be made in the case of pensions.

Some gentlemen, especially those from the South, claim that the pension system is costing too much. I do not know what the future demands upon the Nation's gratitude will be. I shall not stop to count the cost. My only question will be, Do they need it; and if so, how much? If they do, and it stands to reason that they will, I am willing to give it to them, regardless of its cost. We will then show the nations of the world that this Republic, at least, is not ungrateful, nor forgetful of its defenders. To those who are worrying about the increased cost, let them remember that at every period of the expansion of our pension policy there has been worry and objections to every increase in pensions, and yet the country has been able at all times to meet its debt of gratitude, to fulfill its governmental obligations, and to prosper. Let them remember that every dollar that the Government spends for pensions makes the Government just so much stronger in the affections of its citizens. The money goes into every avenue of trade, and into every section of the country. It is true that larger amounts may go into certain sections of the country than others, but there are well-established historical reasons why the amount of pensions distributed in our Southern States is smaller than the amount thereof spent in the North, East, and West. In numerous cases the distribution of pensions under our present system saves the old soldier or sailor or his widow from State, county, or municipal charity. Nothing could be sadder than to see one of the Nation's heroes dependent upon public or private charity. Loyal and patriotic Americans of all political parties are determined that such shall not be the sad lot of any of the Nation's defenders.

Every loyal, patriotic, and grateful American approves of the liberal granting of pensions to our old soldiers and sailors, their widows and minor children and dependents. No government, whether a monarchy or republic, has ever treated its soldiers and sailors and their dependents as liberally as this Government has treated its soldiers and sailors, their widows, and their dependents. Those who fought and bled for the Nation in time of war, and their widows and dependents, are worthy of their country's gratitude, and with the advance of their years and inability to labor, the Nation's gratitude and affection should be increased and not diminished.

DEMOCRATIC FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS.

Some of our opponents, however, may be disposed to contend and assert that the solicitude and gratitude of the Democratic Party for the old Union soldiers has but recently been born, or may be prompted by other than reasons of gratitude to the Union soldiers.

Permit me to here insert a list of the various pension laws which were either approved by a Democratic President or passed by a Democratic House of Representatives. Legislative history proves what I now here credit to the Democratic Party:

First. Act of August 15, 1876, providing for the issuance of artificial limbs, or commutation therefor, to disabled soldiers and seamen, and providing transportation for the purpose of having the same properly fitted.

Second. Act of February 28, 1877, increasing the pension of those who lost both an arm and a leg.

Third. An act of March 9, 1878, granting pensions on account of service in the War of 1812 and the Revolutionary War, requiring a service of but 14 instead of 60 days on the part of the survivors of the War of 1812, and granting pensions to widows, regardless of the date of the marriage to the soldiers of this war. It also granted pensions to widows of soldiers of the Revolutionary War on a service of 14 days. Former laws required a marriage prior to the treaty of peace in the case of widows of the War of 1812.

Fourth. Act of June 17, 1878, increasing to $72 per month the pensions of those who lost both hands, both feet, or the sight of both eyes incident to the service.

Fifth. Act of March 3, 1879, increasing to $37.50 all pensions on account of amputation at the hip joint. This sum was afterwards increased to $45 per month by a Democratic House.

Sixth. Acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879, granting arrears of pensions from the date of discharge, generous measures which benefited more than 225,000 pensioners at once and caused the annual pension rate to leap from $33,708,526.19 to $57,240,540.14. The Republican Party had control of both Houses of Congress for more than 10 years after the close of the war, but passed no legislation of this character.

Seventh. Act of June 21, 1879, abolishing biennial medical examinations and providing that in no case shall a pension be withdrawn or reduced except upon notice to the pensioner and a hearing upon sworn testimony.

Eighth. Act of June 16, 1880, giving $72 per month to all those who became totally helpless for any cause incident to the service.

Ninth. Act of February 26, 1881, for the protection of pensioners in the soldiers' homes.

Tenth. Act of July 4, 1884, which established the proper relation which should exist between attorneys and clients and fixed by law the fees to be allowed in pension cases. By this act a Democratic Congress placed the strong arm of the law between the helpless applicant and the rapacious agent.

Eleventh. Act of July 14, 1892, establishing an intermediate rate of pensions between $30 and $72 per month, and fixing the rate of $50 for all who required frequent and periodical though not regular and constant personal aid and attention.

Twelfth. Act of August 5, 1892, granting pensions to Army nurses and forbidding the demanding of a fee by claim agents for prosecuting this class of cases. This was a generous recognition of the noble heroines who, leaving home and loved ones behind, in self-sacrifice braved pestilence and hardship to minister to the sick in the hospitals of the Army.

Thirteenth. Act of December 21, 1893, making a pension a vested right.

Fourteenth. Act of April 18, 1884, making it a felony for any person to falsely or fraudulently represent himself to be an officer of the United States.

Fifteenth. Act of March 19, 1886, increasing from $8 to $12 per month the pensions of 79,989 widows and dependents on the roll at the time as well as tens of thousands who have since been placed thereon. These certificates were issued by a Democratic Commissioner of Pensions, without any expense or unnecessary delay to those deserving beneficiaries.

Sixteenth. Act of May 17, 1886, amending the reports of the War Department, which discriminated against a large and worthy class of soldiers, relieving thousands of unfortunate veterans of the hardships worked by the resting of the charges against them, based upon technical errors in the records.

Seventeenth. Act of August 4, 1886, increasing the pensions of 10,030 cripples—armless and legless veterans.

Eighteenth. Act of January 29, 1887, benefiting about 30,000 survivors and widows of the Mexican War.

Nineteenth. Act of June 7, 1888, granting arrears to widows from the date of the death of the husband and providing that all United States officials authorized to administer oaths should administer all oaths required to be made in pension cases in the execution of vouchers for pensions free of charge. This arrearage act benefited at once more than 200,000 soldiers' widows.

Twentieth. Act of August 27, 1888, increasing pensions on account of deafness.

Twenty-first. Act of February 12, 1889, granting an increase of pension from $72 to $100 per month to all persons who lost both hands in the service and line of duty.

Twenty-second. Act of March 1, 1889, relating to the payment of pensions to widows or dependent heirs where subsequent to the issue of the check the pensioner dies.

Twenty-third Act of March 2, 1889, removing certain technical charges in the record and relieving a large and meritorious class of soldiers.

Twenty-fourth. Act of March 2, 1895, which abolished the rate of $2 and $4 and fixed the lowest rate of pension at $6 per month.

Twenty-fifth. An act of May 11, 1912, granting a service pension to certain defined veterans of the Civil War, increasing the pension of more than 400,000 soldiers, and which is the best pension law ever enacted by Congress, thereby increasing the annual pension roll from $153,686,500 to $180,240,145.84.

SHERWOOD PENSION BILL.

On the first day of the special session of the Sixty-second Congress, being the 4th day of April, 1911, that gallant old soldier Democrat, Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, chairman of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, introduced the first bill of the session, H. R. 1, providing a general increase of pensions to Civil War veterans based upon service. This bill, in modified form, subsequently became a law on the 11th of May, 1912, and now constitutes the new general pension law, based upon age and service. The Sherwood bill, as introduced and as passed by the House of Representatives in December, 1911, was a far more liberal and just bill than it was, after it had been amended by the Republican Senate.

The Sherwood bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, provided that any soldier or sailor who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and received an honorable discharge and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty and is now unfit for manual labor, through causes not due to his own vicious habits, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty, resulting in his disability, is now unable to perform manual labor shall be entitled to a pension of $30 per month. If this bill had become a law as it passed the House of Representatives it would have been a far more liberal pension bill than the present general pension law, and would have given greater satisfaction to the ex-Union soldiers and sailors. Under its terms every such soldier or sailor, who had been wounded in battle or in line of duty or was disabled from diseases contracted in the service, would have been entitled to a maximum pension of $30 per month, regardless of other causes, like old age, accidents, or other diseases contracted since his service, and now rendering the soldier or sailor unable to perform manual labor. In other words, his maximum pensionable disability would not have been based upon present disabilities arising from diseases of service origin only.

The Secretary of the Interior, at the time that the Sherwood bill was pending, estimated that at least 15,000 old soldiers and sailors would be benefited by this $30 per month disability clause. The increase in disbursements under this clause was estimated not to exceed $2,500,000 per year. It was truly stated that if the bill became a law with this maximum disability clause that it would necessitate an examination of every applicant for the maximum pension by an examining surgeon, or a board of examining surgeons, and that the increased cost due to such medical examinations would probably reach $200,000 a year. This supposed increase in expenses of medical examinations would have been a mere trifle as compared with the great relief that would have been provided for and shared in by the old soldiers and sailors by the disbursement of $2,500,000 more annually among 15,000 of their number.

In the Senate in 1912, during that same session of Congress, the Sherwood pension bill was amended by inserting in lieu of the language above cited the following:

That any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and received an honorable discharge, and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty and is now unfit for manual labor by reason thereof, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty resulting in his disability, is now unable to perform manual labor, shall be paid the maximum pension under this act, to wit, $30 per month without regard to length of service or age.

It will thus be seen that the Senate amendment based the right of the soldier or sailor to $30 per month pension upon his present inability to perform manual labor because of wounds, injuries, or diseases incurred in the war exclusively, and did not take into consideration, as did the original Sherwood bill, other causes besides those of service origin, which might aggravate and contribute to the present inability of an old soldier or sailor to perform manual labor.

Various attempts have been made in the Pension Bureau to have that bureau construe this clause in the present pension law, so as to give the old soldiers and sailors the benefit of the $30 per month maximum pension as was intended by the original Sherwood bill. There are many arguments that can be advanced in favor of such a construction, but the bureau, consistent with its past record for years, has given the benefit of the doubt to the Government and against the old soldiers. This is a construction which is undoubtedly inconsistent with the purposes of establishing a pension system, but it has become so firmly established in the Pension Bureau that argument against it is no longer of any avail, and the only relief that can be secured from the burdens of this wrongful rule of construction is by the passage of remedial legislation by Congress.

When we remember that the Sulloway general pension bill, after having passed the Republican House in the Sixty-first Congress, was finally killed in the Republican Senate of that Congress; and when we find that the Sherwood bill, introduced by a Democratic soldier and passed by a Democratic House in the Sixty-second Congress, was amended by the Republican Senate in that Congress so as to make it less liberal by $2,500,000 each year, and so as to make this maximum pension applicable to 15,000 less soldiers and sailors, we can readily see that our Republican legislators are not always safely and consistently the best or most reliable champions and friends of the old soldiers and sailors.

These facts, as well as others, conclusively prove that the old soldiers' friends are not to be found entirely in any one party. They prove that their friends are to be found in all parties, and that those only are his friends who entertain patriotic sentiments and are therefore grateful to the defenders of their country.

History shows that there were times when partisan political exigencies were such that the Republican Party did not consider the time ripe for the liberalizing of pensions, as well as the Democratic Party found itself in such positions. But the old soldiers have always been reasonable and consistent in their pension demands, and can be safely relied upon to continue so.

Let me say in absolutely good faith and as their friend that it is not always wise for an old soldier to carry all of his eggs in one basket, for he has, and will continue to have, loyal friends in both parties. No fair and liberal minded Member of Congress should ever look upon pension matters from a partisan standpoint. In these days when the selfish and powerful money interests of the country are making a determined attempt to howl and cry down the amount of annual pensions, and actually abuse the friends of the old soldiers who vote for these necessary appropriations, it is well that the friends of the old soldiers should not know any party when they come to provide for soldiers and sailors' pensions. Let them ascertain the extent of the need of the Nation's defenders, and then without hesitation vote the amount of those needs.

SPECIAL PENSIONS OF THE SIXTY-SECOND AND SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESSES.

As a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses, I have had an opportunity of becoming familiar with the workings of that committee and the rules and spirit upon which such pension claims are weighed and considered. It is with pleasure that I can truthfully say that during the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses upon that committee there has been no exhibition of partisanship or sectionalism among the members in the consideration of claims. All claims coming before that committee are considered upon their actual merits. Entering into the merits are always the elements of age, service, need, and destitution of the soldier, his widow, or dependent. We sit and act as a court of equity in the true sense of the word. It is not necessary for a needy and destitute old soldier, or his widow, to have the acquaintance of a Member of Congress, or to be recommended by some one of political or social prominence. The ear of every member of that committee is always open to the appeal of the weary, needy, and afflicted old soldier, or his widow. Acting as a court of equity, we are freer to act upon the merits of each claim than is the Bureau of Pensions. As in all courts of equity, technicalities which prevent the doing of justice are brushed away, and the course of justice allowed to flow freely. The work of that committee has been considerably reduced since the passage of the Sherwood general-pension law. We must, however, expect the work from now on to increase. This is due to the large number of old soldiers and sailors who will be reduced to needy and destitute circumstances by old age and inability to perform manual labor.

AUTOMATIC ADVANCES IN RATE OF PENSIONS.

Soon after the present general pension law, known as the Sherwood bill, went into operation, trouble was experienced in adjusting the rates to which each soldier and sailor claimant was entitled. It was easy for the Bureau of Pensions to ascertain from its records the exact length of each soldier and sailor's service in the Army or Navy. It was, however, a far more difficult matter to determine the exact age of each such soldier or sailor. In many instances it was found that the applicant for a pension under this law was uncertain as to his own age or date of birth. In many instances where this was the case, the soldier or sailor was also without available means for ascertaining the same. In many instances soldiers and sailors had, in previous applications and communications to the Pension Bureau, carelessly and inaccurately stated their age and the date of their birth under oath. Those previous affidavits and communications were made at a time when neither the department nor the soldier or sailors were interested in his birth or age. Consequently that question was then immaterial. But, as the amount of pension under the Sherwood pension bill depends upon age as well as service, it became necessary and important, both to the Government and the soldier or sailor, that his exact age should be determined in the allowance of his application for a pension under that law. In a large percentage of cases it was found that the soldier or sailor had made in the past conflicting statements as to the date of his birth and his age, and the bureau would compel him to resort to all kinds of evidence to prove the date of his birth.

In many such instances his application under that act was allowed without determining the exact date of his birth or his exact age. For instance, if he claimed to be 73 years of age, if the different affidavits made by him in the past all showed that he had represented himself as being of such an age that at the time of the application, according to previous affidavits, that he would be 71, 72, or 73 years of age, without determining his exact age, the bureau at that time would allow him the rate of pension provided for a soldier of his service who had reached the age of 70 years, because, according to all affidavits, he was then over 70 years of age, and entitled to the rate of pension provided for a given service and that age. Soldiers and sailors whose claims were allowed under such conditions will be required, before their next claim for increase on account of age will be allowed, to prove definitely and positively the date of their birth.

Since the discovery of this troublesome situation Congress passed, March 4, 1913, an amendment which, in substance, provides that when a soldier's or sailor's claim under this law has been passed upon and allowed, and his exact age once determined, there shall be kept a record in the Pension Bureau showing the name, length of service, and age of each claimant and date of his birth, the monthly rate of pension granted to or received by him, and the county and State of his residence, and that further increases in the rate of pension under that act on account of advancing age shall be made without further application by the pensioner and shall take effect and commence from the date he is shown by the aforesaid record to have attained the age provided by the act as a period for advancing said rate, the object of this being to advance the rate of pensions automatically, as provided in the Sherwood pension bill, without expense to the pensioner, and by requiring the Commissioner of Pensions and his office force to take judicial notice of the recorded evidence of the date of each pensioner's birth when once established. This law is working very satisfactorily, but there are still many instances in which it is necessary for the pensioner to supply satisfactory evidence of his age before he will be automatically allowed an advance in his pension rate. But once the age of a pensioner has been determined to the satisfaction of the bureau, it will not be necessary for the pensioner to again submit any such proof or to be delayed in the regular receipt of his pension.

MONTHLY PAYMENTS.

The question of providing for monthly payment of pensions, instead of quarterly payments, has received some attention at the hands of Congress during this session. A number of bills for that purpose have been introduced, some of which have been considered. It would appear at first that every pensioner would be in favor of this movement, yet such does not seem to be the case. The old soldiers themselves have manifested but little interest in the proposed change. There appears, however, to be a great division of sentiment among them in certain sections of the country. In other sections no interest, pro or con, has been manifested.

It appears that the executive council of the National Grand Army of the Republic, which council is the highest body next to the grand encampment itself, at the national encampment held at Chattanooga, after such proposed change had been discussed during the address of the commander in chief, unanimously decided against monthly pension payments.

The present Commissioner of Pensions professes that originally he was in favor of the monthly payment of pensions, but since considering the subject and investigating the sentiment among the old soldiers he finds that there is at present no sufficient demand to justify the change. He appears to be now somewhat against the movement, owing to the additional expense which it will involve and the seeming indifference of pensioners.

The additional expense is estimated by him at $1,000,000 per annum. I can not, however, bring myself to believe that there is any substantial foundation whatsoever for any such high estimate of additional expense. I am reliably informed that the present expense of paying pensions by checks under the present system of paying quarterly, or four times a year, is only $100,000. If that be true, then expense of monthly payments would be four times that, or $400,000, a mere bagatelle to the Nation, providing that the change is desired. The subject seems to be new, and perhaps the idea of such a change has not as yet been fully discussed and considered among the old soldiers. They and their friends, however, can rely upon the assurance that whenever they manifest a majority, or strong desire for the change, that Congress will readily grant the same.

LOST CHECKS.

Among the various bills introduced at this session of Congress for the relief of the old soldiers is one for the issuing of duplicates of lost pension checks. The present law requires that when a pension check has been lost, or mislaid, or accidentally destroyed, that application may be made for a duplicate, which, upon the filing of a bond by the pensioner, will be issued at the end of six months. This is an unnecessary hardship upon the old soldier, who has been so unfortunate as to not receive his check or who has lost the same.

A bill providing that these duplicate checks in place of lost checks shall be issued 30 days after filing an application therefor has been favorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and there is every reason to believe that it will pass Congress unanimously when it is reached upon the calendar.

SOLDIER SHOULD HAVE BENEFIT OF DOUBT.

The entire history and practice of the Pension Bureau shows that in nearly every instance all technicalities are resolved in favor of the Government and against the soldier or sailor. It further shows that in nearly every instance the Government has been given the benefit of the doubt, and as a result the soldier or sailor got the worst of it. This rule of construction and procedure may have been justified years ago when the pension law relating to Civil War soldiers and sailors was in its infancy. At this late date, however, when the soldiers' and sailors' comrades are scattered to the four winds and can not be found, when others are dead, when age has dimmed the memory of others, when the securing of evidence is most difficult, and when the soldier or sailor is most in need of a pension from the Government, it is time that this rule of construction and of solving technicalities should be changed, and the benefit of the doubt and the solving of technicalities should be in favor of the soldier, sailor, or his widow.

Again, the Pension Bureau seems to be working in some ruts of past ages in other respects. If that bureau would divert or turn from some of these old traveled ruts or routes, justice would be done the old soldier and sailor much quicker than it is done at present and more often. That bureau seems to have the audacity to even question acts of Congress, especially in the case of special pension acts. Even attempts are sometimes made to refuse payment of special pension acts where there is a misspelling of the soldier's, sailor's, or widow's name, which does not change the sound of the name or the identity of the person, and where there is not the slightest evidence to lead them to believe that the pensioner is any other than the person mentioned in the bill. Even a pension granted to a soldier, sailor, or widow by the full middle name by a special act of Congress is ignored and dishonored, because the name of the soldier, sailor, or widow may have originally appeared on the records by the full given name and the initial of the middle name. This happened in cases where there was absolutely no question as to the identity of the soldier or sailor. In the interest of justice to the old soldiers and sailors such quibbles and technicalities should be dispensed with.

WIDOWS MARRIED SUBSEQUENT TO JUNE 27, 1890.

There are a few features of the present pension laws that are wrong, inequitable, and indefensible. Time will not permit me to discuss them in detail. In a short time, I expect, most of them will receive the careful attention of Congress. If once attention can be brought to them, I have no doubt but what justice will be done. The most unreasonable, arbitrary, and unjust provision in the pension laws at the present time is the one relating to granting pensions to widows who married subsequent to June 27, 1890. That act provides, among other things, a pension of $12 per month for the widow of a soldier or sailor during her widowhood, provided that such widow shall have married her soldier or sailor husband prior to June 27, 1890. This act has been amended several times since, but this provision has never been amended or changed. There is now no law under which a widow who married since June 27, 1890, can secure a pension by law unless her soldier husband died of wounds or injuries inflicted during his war service or died from diseases contracted in such service. On the 27th of this coming June it will be 24 years since that harsh, unjustifiable, and arbitrary law was passed—nearly a quarter of a century.

It undoubtedly answered the purpose for which this arbitrary and inflexible date was fixed for a number of years after its passage. Under the strict letter of the law we may now have, on the one hand, a widow who married a soldier on the 24th of June, 1890, and on the other hand a widow who married another soldier on the 30th of June, 1890. One is entitled to a pension under the law at the bureau and the other is not. The husband of the widow marrying before the 27th of June, 1890, may have died a week after that date, and yet his widow is entitled to a pension under the law at the Pension Bureau. The husband of the other widow, who married him three days after the 27th of June, 1890, may die now, after she has lived with and cared for him as a faithful and devoted wife for 24 years, and yet under the law she is not entitled to a pension at the bureau.

This soldier's widow may have lived and struggled on with him during those 24 years in sorrow and in toil, in adversity and in poverty, from youth to old age, through storm and through sunshine, and it makes no difference for how many long, weary days and nights, through long years, she may have nursed him in his sickness and helplessness, nor that in sorrow and tears she spends her last dollar to plant flowers on his grave, yet she is turned down at the Pension Bureau because of the provisions of this harsh, unjust, and arbitrary law. The fragrance of her dutiful and beautiful life has been wasted on the desert air. Justice demands that so long as we are to continue the policy of pensioning the widows of soldiers and sailors that this class of widows who married since June 27, 1890, should be afforded immediate relief and justice. It is true that the Committee on Invalid Pensions frequently recommends special bills in the case of very needy and destitute widows who married within a short time after the passage of that law. But the granting of a special bill to one of this class, when they all ought to enjoy this privilege as a lawful right, is a rank discrimination and an injustice to those who married no later and who have not been able to reach the sympathies of some Congressman.

BILL FOR RELIEF.

Having had this deplorable pension situation in mind for some time, and having closely noticed the injustice of its effects, I have had the pleasure during this session of Congress of introducing H. R. 15841, a bill to change the arbitrary provisions of the law of June 27, 1890, and to substitute therefor a more just and automatically working provision for widows.

In my bill I have stricken out from the present law the words—

Provided, That said widow shall have married such soldier or sailor prior to June 27, 1890—

And have substituted in lieu thereof the following words:

Provided, That said widow shall have married said soldier or sailor at least six years prior to the death of her husband soldier or husband sailor, and regardless of whether the death of said soldier or sailor shall have occurred before or may occur after the passage of this act: And provided further, That no widow of a soldier or sailor, who shall become such widow after the passage of this act, shall be entitled to a pension under the provisions of section 2 of this act, unless she shall have attained the age of 50 years at the time of the death of her soldier or sailor husband.

I believe that when the injustice of the present widows' pension law is brought forcibly to the attention of this House, that some provision for relief will command its sympathies, and the result will be the passage of remedial legislation similar to that contained in the bill which I have introduced. I am sure that if you will but consider it, that its virtues will commend themselves to every one of you. The second provision in my new bill provides a guard against the alleged improper and immoral practices and impositions which it is said are sometimes practiced on the old soldiers and sailors by unscrupulous women. It contains a provision which automatically provides a pension for a widow who shall have resided with her soldier or sailor husband at least six years before his death. Of course, the provision of cohabitation with the soldier and the age of the widow at the time of his death are arbitrary and subject to change before the passage of the bill as the same may commend themselves to the favorable consideration of Congress.

I respectfully invite the careful consideration of this bill by Members of Congress, and by the old soldiers and sailors, their wives, and the widows of those deceased. I not only invite your consideration, but also your assistance in creating a proper interest and demand in this House for its passage or the passage of some similar bill by this House at its next regular session. There can be, and there is, no justification for the arbitrary method which now prevents a widow who has lived 24 years with her soldier or sailor husband from lawfully obtaining a pension at the bureau. It is true that it will increase the pension roll by several millions; but if it is right, and I believe it is, to continue the policy of pensioning soldiers' and sailors' widows, then there can be no excuse, apology, or justification for the present arbitrary discrimination between widows who married since June 27, 1890, and those who married before.

Let us do by these widows of Union soldiers and sailors what we have done in this Congress, within the last six weeks, for the widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain or in the Philippine Insurrection. That bill passed this House by a vote of three-quarters of those voting thereon in favor of it, and it contained a provision that a pensionable widow shall be one who has married an officer or enlisted man who served in one of those wars previous to the passage of that act. This is as it should be at present, but it is not as it should be in the future. It should contain a provision similar to that incorporated in the bill which I have introduced, providing that any widow who shall, after the passage of such act, marry an officer or enlisted man who served in such wars, shall be entitled to a pension of $12 per month, providing she has been married to the soldier for six years or more before his death.

The hardships, cares, and sorrows endured by the widows who married since June 27, 1890, were and are naturally, on the average, greater and more severe by reason of the old age, helplessness, and inability of their soldier husbands, than were the hardships of those who married previous to that date. In conclusion, permit me to impress upon you that in the matter of widows' pensions, as well as in all legislation, there should be equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

[Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. AUSTIN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DAVIS. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY].

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of the membership of this House to some observations which I desire to submit on the "Pretentions of Great Britain to territorial rights in Central America" with respect to its bearing upon the Panama tolls controversy. I shall discuss it from a historical standpoint, having on another occasion given some attention to the interpretative features of the Clayton-Bulwer and Hay-Pauncefote treaties.

So much has been unwisely said, or inaccurately stated concerning the rights of the United States and Great Britain under the Clayton-Bulwer and Hay-Pauncefote treaties with respect to the Panama Canal, that a consideration of the underlying facts from which a proper conclusion may be based may well arrest public attention.

In his remarkable and able address before the United States Senate on January 21, 1913, Senator ROOT advanced his major premise for the British position on the tolls question, the inducement or consideration for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as follows:

Further than that, Great Britain was a Carribbean power. She had Bermuda and the Bahamas; she had Jamaica and Trinidad; she had the Windward Islands and the Leeward Islands; she had British Guiana and British Honduras; she had, moreover, the Mosquito Coast—a vast stretch of territory upon the eastern shore of Central America which included the river San Juan and the valley and harbor of San Juan de Nicaragua or Greytown. All men's minds then were concentrated upon the Nicaragua Canal route as they were until after the treaty of 1901 was made.

And thus when the United States turned its attention toward joining those coasts by the canal through the Isthmus it found Great Britain in possession of the eastern end of the route which men generally believed would be the most available route for the canal. Accordingly, the United States sought a treaty with Great Britain by which Great Britain should renounce the advantage which she had and admit the United States to equal participation with her in the control and the protection of a canal across the isthmus. From that came the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Senator ROOT further said:

Your will observe, Mr. President, that under these provision—of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—the United States gave up nothing that it then had. Its obligations were entirely looking to the future, and Great Britain gave up its rights under the protectorate over the Mosquito Coast, gave up its rights to what was supposed to be the eastern terminus of the canal. And, let me say without recurring to it again, under this treaty, after much discussion which ensued as to the meaning of its terms, Great Britain did surrender her rights to the Mosquito Coast.

Surely these are strong statements, which, if supported by exact history, would give Great Britain an equitable standing in the Panama controversy of much importance. Senator ROOT's assertions will not in all respects bear the scrutiny of historical or diplomatic research, and are the more remarkable when considered in the light of the fact that the United States never acquiesced in, but always protested against the flimsy title which Great Britain set up to a protectorate of the Mosquito Coast or sovereignty over any portion of Central America. Coincident with a renewal of interest throughout the United States in an interoceanic canal caused by the opening of the far West, Great Britain revived her long-abandoned claim over the Mosquito Coast. She broadened the confines of the Mosquito territory beyond the description of any map or records then extant, so as to include the ancient town of San Juan de Nicaragua, the eastern terminus of the then proposed Nicaraguan transoceanic canal. On January 1, 1848, a British force expelled the State of Nicaragua, hauled down the Nicaraguan flag, and raised the Mosquito flag in its place, changing the name of the town from San Juan de Nicaragua to Greytown.

The British establishment at Belize, the seizure of the island of Ruatan, belonging to Honduras, the encroachment of the English settlements, the seizure of the Tiger Island, on the Pacific side, were all in violation of Great Britain's treaties with Spain and in opposition to the then well-defined terms of the Monroe doctrine. It led the Government of the United States to make vigorous protests, for said Mr. Buchanan, while minister to London:

These proceedings gave birth to serious apprehension throughout the United States that Great Britain intended to monopolize for herself the control over the different routes between the Atlantic and Pacific, which, since the acquisition of California, had become of vital importance to the United States. Under this impression it was impossible that the American Government could any longer remain silent and acquiescing spectators of what was passing in Central America.

In 1848 Mr. Buchanan, then Secretary of State, gave instructions to Mr. Hise:

Under the assumed title of protector of the kingdom of the Mosquitoes, a miserable and degraded and insignificant tribe of Indians, she doubtless intends to acquire an absolute dominion over this vast extent of seacoast. With what little reason she advances this pretension appears from the convention between Great Britain and Spain signed at London on the 14th of July, 1786.

Whatever may have been the basis of Great Britain's claim in connection with the Mosquito Coast or of other portions of Central America, it is unnecessary to go back of 1783. After a long period of strife, the terms of settlement with Spain were incorporated in the treaty of 1783 and the treaty of 1786, under which Great Britain abandoned to Spain all claim of sovereignty over this territory.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. Yes.

Mr. POST. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that Senator ROOT's contention was right to this extent, that at the time of the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty Great Britain had rights which she claimed in the Mosquito Coast, and in order to get rid of those rights it was necessary to enter into an agreement with Great Britain.

Mr. AINEY. Ah, the gentleman has failed to read with discrimination the diplomatic correspondence between this country and Great Britain. That treaty was entered into for the purpose of getting rid of Great Britain's flimsy pretension to such rights, but not in recognition of them. For many years prior to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty this country voiced protest after protest against Great Britain's violations of the Monroe doctrine and violation of her treaties made with the Government of Spain, under which she had abrogated all claims to territorial rights in Central America.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania specify any considerations with which Great Britain parted for the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? When the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was done away with, were not the two countries placed in statu quo, precisely as if there had never been any treaty before? And then, with what consideration did Great Britain part for the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. AINEY. I think that as I progress I shall fully answer the gentleman. I maintain in this statement that Great Britain had no rights in Central America or in the Mosquito Coast. Because she had no rights, there was no basis for the argument which the distinguished Senator advanced with respect to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I should like to make this suggestion to the gentleman, that under the treaty that we had with Colombia in 1846, giving us the right to construct a canal across the Isthmus at Panama, how could Great Britain have lost anything by our carrying out that agreement, when we had a treaty with Colombia prior to the time that we executed the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which did not apply at all to Panama?

Mr. AINEY. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a very excellent one, but I trust that I shall not be led aside from the purpose of my remarks, which I propose to confine to the history of the claims of Great Britain to territorial rights in Central America and to the Mosquito Coast, and to show that Great Britain had by treaties and acts of Parliament long prior to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty abrogated all such claims.

Let me again call your attention to the fact that in 1783 Great Britain entered into a treaty with Spain, under article 4, of which she stipulated that with the exception of the territory between the river Belize and the Rio Hondo, within which permission was granted to British subjects to cut logwood—

All English who may be dispersed in any part of the Spanish continent ("continenté Espagnol") or in any of the islands whatsoever dependent on the aforesaid Spanish Government, and for whatsoever reason it might be, without exception, shall retire within the district above described in the space of 18 months from the exchange of the ratifications.

The treaty further provided that the permission to cut logwood "shall not be considered as derogating in any wise from his [Spanish Majesty's] right of sovereignty" over this logwood district, and it stipulated moreover that—if any fortification should have been actually heretofore erected within the limits marked out, his Britannic Majesty shall cause them all to be demolished, and he will order his subjects not to build any new ones.

Notwithstanding the very plain terms of this treaty Great Britain questioned whether the Mosquito Coast was included. This led to the treaty of 1786, where even that quibble was settled. It provided:

His Britannic Majesty's subjects and the other colonists who have heretofore enjoyed the protection of England shall evacuate the country of the Mosquito as well as the continent in general and the islands adjacent, without exception, situate beyond the new limits prescribed by the convention within which British subjects were to be permitted to cut not only logwood but mahogany and all other wood—and the Belize or logwood district was therein—indisputably acknowledged to belong of right to the Crown of Spain.

With this treaty there passed every semblance of legitimacy to Great Britain's claim to sovereignty on the Mosquito Coast or in Central America. A bare limited logging right without sovereignty was reserved to some of her citizens in Belize.

How did Great Britain again acquire her right to the Mosquito Coast and to British Honduras (Belize), which Senator ROOT says she surrendered under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in order that the United States might be admitted to equal participation with her (England) in the control and protection of the canal across the Isthmus?

By the treaty of Amiens (1801) Great Britain acquired the Island of Trinidad, South America, from Spain, but nothing more; nor did she acquire any Central American rights under the treaties of 1809 and 1814.

By act of Parliament (57 and 59 Geo. III) it was acknowledged that the British settlement at Belize was "not within the territory and dominion of His Majesty," but was merely

"a settlement for certain purposes in the possession and under the protection of His Majesty."

Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Dallas July 26, 1856, summarizes the whole matter:

Great Britain had not at the time of the convention of April 19, 1850 (the Clayton-Bulwer treaty), any rightful possessions in Central America save only the usufructuary settlement at the Belize.

Two objects were sought to be accomplished by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, 1850; one, the abandonment by Great Britain of her never admitted claim of right to the Mosquito and other Central American territory, and the other, the certainty of a speedily built canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific.

In 1848 California was acquired, but the Pacific coast was almost unknown and uncharted. The population of the United States was 23,000,000; our transcontinental railroads were yet unrealized; the demand was urgent for an Isthmian Canal. The United States could not then unaided undertake the construction of such an engineering project. England could provide the means; the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into, with many assurances that British capital would be immediately offered.

England's unwarranted claim to the port and territory which controlled the Atlantic entrance to the proposed Nicaraguan route had been followed by her seizure of Tiger Island on the Pacific side. Thus Great Britain had attempted to bottle either end of the proposed canal. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, if plain language conveys meaning, her absurd contention to territorial rights on the Mosquito Coast was again abandoned.

Article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was intended to sustain the American contention against the British territorial assumption in the Mosquito or other Central American country. The material portion, here italicized for emphasis, reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same.

Senator ROOT says of this treaty, "after much discussion which ensued as to the meaning of its terms, Great Britain did surrender her rights to the Mosquito Coast."

Great Britain recognized that she had no rights in Central America or in Belize by an act of Parliament during the reign of George III, wherein it was acknowledged that the British settlement at Belize was "not within the territory and dominion of His Majesty," but was merely "a settlement for certain purposes in the possession and under the protection of His Majesty."

So the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into, the purpose of it being, as set forth in the diplomatic correspondence, to settle favorably to our contention the claim which Great Britain had without the slightest foundation set up in violation of her solemn treaties and undertakings. This was the primary object of the treaty, and to build the canal across the Isthmus or across Central America was secondary.

Mr. Chairman, this is briefly the diplomatic history leading up to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Under it Great Britain, as she had ignored her treaties with Spain in 1783 and 1786, continued to exercise control in Central America and the Mosquito Coast. Finding from time to time technical grounds to avoid her obligations she never actually abandoned her possession until after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, notwithstanding she had stipulated so to do. Under a claim of a protectorate over the Mosquito Coast, differentiating between the language "sovereignty" and "protectorate," she kept her hands on the territory which under several treaties and under an act of Parliament she had specifically admitted was not hers.

Senator ROOT says of this treaty:

After much discussion, which ensued as to the meaning of its terms, Great Britain did surrender her rights to the Mosquito Coast.

It is difficult for the ordinary mind to conjure up a dispute as to the meaning of the treaty words under which the United States and Great Britain agreed "not to colonize or assume or exercise any jurisdiction over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."

Notwithstanding this explicit language, the ingenuity of British diplomacy did conjure up an excuse for a continuance and enlargement of her Central American territorial contentions.

She attempted to differentiate between sovereignty and protectorship in the Mosquito territory, and she broadened her logging camp in Belize, which by treaty stipulation was limited in extent, and specifically without sovereignty, into a colony which territorially covered an area as large as three of the smaller States of the Union.

By diplomatic representations and protests the American Government confronted Great Britain with the proposition that there could be no protectorate where there was not an underlying sovereignty; that an ignorant band of Indians, whatever their possessive rights to the land might be, could not exercise any rights of sovereignty over the same, and that the express terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were being violated by her.

The ludicrous character of this so-called sovereignty is disclosed in an article reprinted in Churchill's Voyage; it shows that the regal dignity was acquired by the "king" of the Mosquitos by the gift of a crown and commission; the crown was an old cocked hat and the commission a waggish document that he should kindly use and release such straggling Englishmen as should choose to come that way with plantain, fish, and so forth.

Upon this foundation Lord Palmerston answered the American protest against the violation of the Monroe doctrine by informing Mr. Lawrence, American minister at London in 1848, that—a close political connection had existed between the Crown of Great Britain and the State and Territory of Mosquito for a period of two centuries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman whether he has examined the message of the President of the United States with especial reference to the arguments that are now being submitted in the other legislative branch of this Government with a purpose of discovering whether there has not been an entire shift of reasoning for the removal of the exemption of tolls. On that point I desire to call his attention to a statement in the President's address which is as follows, referring to that exemption:

And is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

On May 5, in the other branch of this Congress, I find in the RECORD, on page 8389, the words of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, Senator STONE, who is presumed from his position to be better acquainted with all matters of foreign relations than any other Member of either branch of Congress, in which he says:

I was fully convinced in my own mind that the United States had a right under the very terms of the treaty itself, and without violating either the letter or the spirit of that convention, to allow our coastwise vessels to pass through the canal free of tolls.

Has the gentleman compared those two statements for the purpose of reconciling them?

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman—if that is intended as an inquiry to me—that I have not; I long since discovered that I had not sufficient agility of mind or body to follow the quick changes which overnight occur in the administration's position. Some time ago I read the platform of the Democratic Party with a good deal of interest. It is not now recognizable as such. I have attempted once or twice to reconcile it with the statements of the gentlemen elected on that platform made on the floor of the House, but I grew tired; and so if the gentleman himself has any explanation I hope he will make it in his own time. As far as I am concerned, I would as soon attempt to "untangle the intangible."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to two other statements.

Mr. AINEY. Very well.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman's attention further, apropos to the discussion of this treaty, to the statement of the President:

Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated matter, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

With the gentleman's permission I will call his attention to a further statement by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in the other body of the National Congress, in which he says:

True it is that in the course of the present debate some Senators and Representatives have declared that the exemption provision of the law of 1912 should be repealed because in their opinion it is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and that its enactment did in some sense involve the good faith and honor of this Nation. But that is being said here in Congress and in American and foreign newspapers, and not by foreign Governments. As to that contention, by whomsoever made, I absolutely dissent, for I still believe that the act of 1912 nsserted no right to which we are not lawfully entitled within the very terms of the treaty. No foreign Government is now asking us to repeal this law; no foreign Government has filed or presented any protest since its enactment.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman, it rather strikes me that there is no parallel, except in the fact that Great Britain has made no less than eight treaties affecting her Central American claims, and in each instance attempted to interpret them against their plain language.

Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State in 1853, thus characterizes Great Britain's violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty:

The protectorate which Great Britain has assumed over the Mosquito Indians is a most palpable infringement of her treaties with Spain, and the authority which she is there exercising under pretense of this protectorate is in derogation of the sovereign rights of several of the Central American States, and contrary to the manifest spirit and intention of the treaty of April 19, 1850, with the United States.

Though ostensibly the direct object of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was to guarantee the free and common use of the contemplated ship canal across the Isthmus, there were other and highly important objects sought to be accomplished by the convention. The stipulation regarded most of all by the United States is that for discontinuing the use of her assumed protectorate of the Mosquito Indians. It was the intention, as it is obviously the import of the treaty of April 19, 1850, to place Great Britain under an obligation to cease her interposition in the affairs of Central America and to confine herself to her limited rights in the Belize. She has by this treaty of 1850 obligated herself not to occupy or colonize any part of Central America or to exercise any dominion therein. Notwithstanding these stipulations, she still asserts the right to hold possession of and to exercise control over large districts of that country and important islands in the bay of Honduras, the unquestionable appendages of the Central American States. This jurisdiction is not less mischievous in its effects nor less objectionable to us, because it is covertly exercised, partly at least, in the name of a miserable tribe of Indians, who have in reality no political organizations, no actual government, not even the semblance of one, except that which is created by British authority and upheld by British power.

In his third annual message to Congress, in 1855, President Pierce voiced a resolute and robust protest against Great Britain's persistent violation of the treaty.

President Buchanan in his fourth annual message to Congress announced that "Her Britannic Majesty concluded a treaty with Honduras on the 28th of November, 1859, and with Nicaragua on the 28th day of August, 1860, relinquishing the Mosquito protectorate." Great Britain recognized by that treaty as belonging "to and under the sovereignty of Nicaragua the country hitherto occupied by the Mosquito Indians within the frontiers of the Republic; that a certain designated district should be assigned to these Indians, but that it should remain under the sovereignty of Nicaragua and should not be ceded by the Indians to any foreign Province or State, and that the British protectorate should cease three months after the exchange of ratification." Great Britain executed a treaty with Guatemala defining the boundaries of Belize in 1859.

The expressions of satisfaction by President Buchanan at this solution of the controversy were premature. They were based upon the assumption that Great Britain had ceased to exercise any influence whatever over the Mosquito Coast. These treaties had as little effect upon British pretensions as did the treaties with Spain and with the United States. Nicaragua protested against the violation, and finally, in 1880, agreed with Great Britain to submit the questions at issue, including "the degree of influence Great Britain was entitled to exercise over the Mosquito Coast," to the arbitrament of the Emperor of Austria. His decision sustained Nicaragua's claim of sovereignty, but, strange to say, imposed limitation on its exercise whereby British influence remained.

The treaties with Nicaragua, Honduras, and Guatemala were made because of the feeling engendered in the United States at the persistent violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which had been entered into on the part of the American Government in the hope that it settled forever the pretension of Great Britain to territorial rights in Central America.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty proved a keen disappointment to the American people. It was a source of annoying and ineffective diplomatic correspondence.

In spite of its terms the British Government continued to claim a protectorate over the Mosquito Coast and did not cease to occupy Bay Islands and the Belize.

With the completion of the Suez Canal, which gave England a short route to India, her interest in the opening of the Isthmian Canal waned. It was apparent that Great Britain did not intend to give financial support to the project as contemplated.

A half century had elapsed since the convention was signed, marked by marvelous development on this side of the Atlantic. What was impossible in 1850 was comparatively easy in 1900. The population of the United States increased to 76,000,000; the material resources had advanced accordingly. Public sentiment crystallized around the statement, "An American canal on American soil under American control."

The negotiations which led to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in 1901 are interesting. It was clearly shown to Great Britain that the American Government had every reason to consider the older treaty abrogated, both because of violation of its terms and by changed conditions. It stood in the way of the construction of the canal.

After years of negotiations it was "superseded" by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, but under it the ever-recurrent "right of Great Britain in Central American affairs" out of merest shadow again appears. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois and to Mr. THACHER to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to take such time as the chairman of the committee could spare me to bring to the attention of the House my reasons for introducing the bill which I filed this afternoon, and I had hoped that there would be a large number of the Members present to hear my suggestions, but in the absence of many of the Members I am going to submit my suggestions for the benefit of the few who are present and this great assembly of vacant seats, hoping that those who read the RECORD may understand some of the reasons that prompt me to act in the matter.

During the consideration of a bill before the Committee of the District of Columbia a few days ago, the bill which was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] providing for an increase in the wages of certain employees of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. Referring to the gentleman's suggestion of the large number of absentees, I trust he will allow it to go into the RECORD that the minority is furnishing about three times as many Members to listen to what the gentleman has to say as the majority.

Mr. GORMAN. I am glad the gentleman refers to that fact, because——

Mr. BARTLETT. There are only 10 Members on that side of the House.

Mr. GORMAN (continuing). Because the majority are doing the courteous thing to-day in meeting that great army of noble women who are here to present their petition to the Congress of the United States [applause], asking that they may have what I believe every citizen of the United States ought to have, without regard to distinction of sex, the right of suffrage. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GORMAN. And in further answer, I might say to the gentleman I desired to submit some suggestions in reference to my bill, or I, too, would be among that great number who are greeting the women who come here from all parts of the country to present their petition.

Mr. SLOAN. What excuse is the gentleman going to give for keeping us here with his eloquence and preventing us seeing the ladies' parade?

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman is not being detained by my eloquence from meeting the ladies; probably because ladies do not vote in his State, therefore he is not concerned about them. But, Mr. Chairman, when interrupted I was about to direct the attention of the committee to this fact: There are a great many men employed here in Washington in the service of the Government of the United States and also in the District government, and they have been so employed, many of them at least, about 30 years, at the insignificant salary of $50 a month, and the bill which I presented is designed to give the men so employed an increase of salary; not certain, particular men, but all men employed by the Federal Government and by the District of Columbia who are classed as skilled or unskilled laborers. I am prompted to introduce this bill because of certain incidents which occurred in the committee room of the District of Columbia. When the bill H. R. 7389 was before the subcommittee of the District Committee a man who represented himself as a lawyer stated he was interested in lobbying for that bill and that he had charged the men whose wages the bill is designed to increase a certain fixed fee, and expected to charge them a contingent fee of 20 per cent of the increase which they would receive if the bill became a law during the first year after the increase was granted. A few months ago a hearing before the Committee of the District of Columbia developed this state of facts: A number of men employed by the District of Columbia receiving $55 a month, I believe it was, had their wages increased by an act passed in the Sixty-second Congress, and a man representing himself as a lawyer or lobbyist had charged these men the enormous sum of $4,000 for alleged services in getting the bill through the House and Senate.

A number of years ago, about 18 years ago, I think it was, I was employed in the Government Printing Office. A number of men in that office at that time were seeking an increase in wages, and rumor had it that these men had raised a fund of $5,000 to get this increase through Congress, and it was my impression then, based upon my inexperience and lack of knowledge and the rumors then in circulation, that the money had to be paid to some Members of Congress. My recollection of this rumor of 18 years ago was revived when the statement was made before the District Committee by one of the men whose wages had been increased by the action of the Sixty-second Congress, while testifying before the District of Columbia Committee, that representations had been made to the men whose wages were increased that the man who was collecting the money did not keep it all for himself, but that he had to distribute it in entertainment of Members of Congress. It is conduct of this kind, I maintain, on the part of lobbyists—which is only a polite name for grafter—that tends to bring the House of Representatives into disrepute, and this House owes it to itself to take action on matters of that character which will forever stop that kind of misrepresentation on the part of lobbyists. I would have the employees of the Federal and District Governments know that the services of a lobbyist in securing an increase of wages through congressional action is not only unnecessary, but that money paid to lobbyists in that regard is wasted, and I shall oppose and do all I can, while I am a Member of this House, to defeat any legislation providing for an increase in pay to Government employees which is inspired by the activity of paid lobbyists or in which any lobbyist claims a fee contingent upon favorable action of Congress. So far as the employees to whom I have referred are concerned, the Government of the United States ought to pay these men, as a matter of right, better wages than it is paying.

When there is an appropriation bill before this House for battleships or for the erection of public buildings or anything else that the Government has to do with we invariably hear it said that the thing to be built or the thing to be done ought to be built or done in such a way as to be in keeping with the character and dignity of the Republic, and the Government of the United States ought to give to the men who work for it wages that will be in keeping with the character of the work they do, and enable them to live decently and maintain their families in respect, and no man can do this, in my judgment, under present living conditions, on a wage of $50 a month. I know it is quite fashionable when proposals are made to increase the salaries of Government employees to cry out against it in the interests of economy and in defense of the overburdened taxpayer, but I do not believe there is a taxpayer in the land among all our hundred millions of people who would object to the Government of the United States paying its laborers $65 a month. I rather think it will be a shock to many good people to know that the United States pays its laborers and some of its mechanics as low a wage as $50 a month. The fact remains, however, and it was stated under oath before the District of Columbia Committee, that there are engineers, firemen, painters, and other mechanics and laborers employed by the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia at $50 a month. The Government employees here in the District of Columbia ought to be paid better wages than men are paid in private employment. When they come here to take up a permanent residence they sacrifice the greatest right of citizenship, the right of suffrage.

When we consider the great sacrifice that men and women have made to secure the right of suffrage and the agitation now going on for its extension the sacrifice of that right for the privilege of holding a Government job in Washington can not be regarded lightly. As I view it, such a sacrifice can not be compensated for in money. Of course one living in Washington may retain a legal residence for the purpose of voting in his State, but if he happens to be a civil-service employee his rights are restricted because political activity may be frowned upon as "pernicious" by those higher in authority than the one whose activity is frowned upon. Then, too, there is so much red tape about Government work, such strict adherence to ancient rules, so much bowing down to convention; so much deference paid to "rank" and "tenure" that initiative and ambition are soon stifled in the atmosphere of official life and Government service in Washington. While employed in the Government Printing Office a number of years ago I met many young men in that and other departments of the Government; men of good education, bright, active, hopeful, full of energy and ambition. They had not been here long then and few of them expected to remain permanently. Some of them have passed away to the great beyond, but many more are here to-day in the same position they held then, working for the same salary and under the same conditions. I am sure that many of them if they had exerted the energy they possessed in the service of some private concern or had gone into business for themselves and worked in their own interests as faithfully and devotedly as they have done for Uncle Sam they would to-day be occupying positions of trust and responsibility in the industrial, commercial, or professional life of their community. There is a beauty and charm about Washington that seems to exercise a subtle influence upon nearly all who come and remain here. They soon become inoculated with a virus that is absolutely fatal to initiative and ambition.

If I were asked by a young man or woman in my community my views as to whether or not they should accept Government employment here in Washington, my advice would be to stay upon the farm and enjoy the real liberty that goes with that life. [Applause.] Or if you must leave the farm, if you must respond to the call of the city, go into industrial or commercial pursuits, where you will know the thrill of ambition. Do not come to Washington. Washington, in my judgment, is the cemetery, the sepulcher, for initiative and ambition. When men say that Government employees here in Washington are overpaid, I say they are not, in view of the sacrifices they make. For myself, I would rather be out in the world of action, where things are being done, taking part in the doing of them, contributing my little share in a humble way, even at a small wage, and be a part of the great world of action, where men grow by contact with their fellows, than be here in the Government service, where men, sooner or later, become inoculated with a virus that destroys their ambition and renders them as absolutely helpless and inefficient after a few years for the great struggle of active life as the hookworm renders inefficient and helpless its victims in the South. Many a young man and woman has come to Washington to get the experience of Government service in the hope that it would help them realize some higher ambition, and in a few years the only hope they entertain is that they may be permitted to retain the position they hold. With them ambition has become stifled. The Government service may have acquired another human machine to carry out its routine, but the country has lost a mind and brain and hand that will never again know the throb of ambition, the restless disposition to try, to do, and to achieve. But this discussion has gone beyond the limits of my bill. The men whom I am interested in helping are the men who now work for small wages for the great big Government of the United States and for the District of Columbia, men who have no organization and who therefore can not act in concert, men who must present their plea for an increase in wages individually, and who, in their helplessness, turn hopefully to the charlatan, who takes their money and assures them he will accomplish that which no one but the Congress of the United States can do; and to make his promise impressive he indulges in the slander that his fee will be spent, in part at least, in winning the favorable consideration of Congress by lavish entertainment. The men who will be benefited by favorable action on my bill are the "underdogs" of the Government service, the men who render a real service for a ridiculously low wage.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH], who has, I think, 10 or 12 minutes——

The CHAIRMAN. The debate will close at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. I will yield of Mr. HINEBAUGH's time two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, now, while the women of the country are assembled here on the Capitol steps to present their demand for equal suffrage, I shall read as a part of my remarks the following declaration, proclaimed by the women of this Nation:

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE—1914.

"When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one half of the people to dissolve the political bondage which has held them subject to the other half of the people, and to assume the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to freedom.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men and women are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments should be instituted among both men and women, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people—women people as well as men people—to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect the safety and happiness of all the people. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes, and, accordingly, all experience has shown that womankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to keep them under absolute subjection, although they are spiritually and mentally ready for freedom, it is their right, it is their duty to throw off such subjection and to provide new guards for their future security and the security of their children.

"Such has been the patient endurance of the women of this country; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to demand an alteration in the system of government. The history of our Government is a history of repeated injustice to women as wives, mothers, and wage earners, and of repeated usurpation by men, many of them with the avowed object of protecting women. But the direct result has been the establishment of a Government which benefits by the knowledge and experience of only one-half of the people, and which can not fully represent the interests and the needs of the other half of the people.

"In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms, beginning even before the Constitution of the United States was adopted. Our repeated petitions have frequently been answered by ridicule and by repeated injustice. We have appealed to the native fairness and magnanimity of men that they disavow these usurpations which inevitably render less dignified, honest, and harmonious the relations between men and women. Men have too long been deaf to this voice of justice and honor, but many are now joining with us in our refusal to acquiesce longer in this unwarrantable sovereignty over us and over our children.

"We, therefore, the women citizens of the United States of America, assembled to-day throughout the Nation, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the organized womanhood of America demanding enfranchisement, solemnly publish and declare that women ought to be politically free.

"Here and now, in this glorious springtime of the year, under the azure skies of hope, in the sunshine of life and enlightenment, we dedicate ourselves to the great work we have undertaken, and go forward to victory remembering that in unity there is strength, and that not even the prejudices of the ages nor the powers of entrenched political privilege can keep in continual disfranchisement half of the citizens of our country when their rights are demanded by the intelligent, patriotic, and united womanhood of the land.

"Women of America, this is our country; we have the same devotions to its institutions as that half of the citizenship that is permitted to govern it. We love the flag, and it means as much to us as it does to the men of our Nation. Women have made, and women will make, as many sacrifices for the honor and glory of these United States as those of her citizens who have all the rights and privilege of the suffrage. Given our full citizenship and allowed to share in the Government, we will be as jealous of the honor and integrity of our country as we have been in the past, when in countless ways we have shown our devotion to the life of the Nation, to the liberty of its citizens, and to the happiness of all the people."

Mr. Chairman, this declaration of the women of the United States is worthy of inscription in our permanent records, and I am glad that it is to be so inscribed. I am thankful, Mr. Chairman, beyond any power I possess to express it, that this declaration does not even suggest the use of force or violence in this land dedicated to equality and equal opportunity. To-morrow is Mothers' Day and the flag of this Republic will proudly wave from the dome of our Capitol in testimony of the fact that we owe the greatest debt of all to womanhood.

That quality which demands of the manhood of this country the recognition of motherhood will demand that the women of this country assume that responsibility which citizenship imposes, and will impose upon women the duty and give to them the right to vote as the only effective way for any citizen to register his or her will in the enactment of law and to share in the responsibility of governing our country.

WOMEN VOTERS IN COLORADO.

In extension of my remarks I call to the attention of Congress that the recent proceedings in the State of Colorado afford the most convincing arguments for equal suffrage that have been presented during all this struggle of women for their political rights. The State was born into existence with the awful load of alien land ownership. Its vast coal and mineral areas from old Spanish days were subjected to appropriation in large tracts by a few men. These lands had passed into the hands of heartless speculators who thought only of the dollars that could be dug out of the mines and ground out of the workers and consumers of coal. Foreign laborers were imported who were not in tune with Colorado laws and ideals, and were placed at work in the mines.

The soulless interests that owned the mines so manipulated the politics of the State as to pass much of the political authority into sordid and corrupt hands. The courts were controlled, county officials were owned, by the corporations, and finally the miners went on a strike. Facing hunger and poverty, they put their wives and children into tents and established a tent colony. Officers of the law, by arson, murder, and various forms of lawlessness, caused many of these women and children to be burned, shot, or suffocated to death.

Civil war and anarchy ensued. The situation was desperate. Bloodshed and carnage was the order of the day, and the weakling that was in the governor's chair was entirely unable to cope with the situation.

WOMEN VOTERS TO THE RESCUE.

In this hour of calamity the women voters of Colorado in their power and sovereignty as voters, a far greater power in such an emergency than could be generated by any beautiful sentiment of motherhood or chivalry, held a mass meeting at the Colorado Statehouse, and here is what the Colorado papers have to say about the work of those women. The Denver Post of April 26 says:

Army of women camp all day at statehouse and compel writhing governor to do bidding. Ammons tries evasion, delay, and subterfuge, but is conquered. Determined, they stuck it out until their cause was victorious.

In another edition the Denver Post says:

FIVE HUNDRED WOMEN CORNER AMMONS IN CAPITOL—DEMAND STRIKE END—SQUIRMING GOVERNOR FORCED TO END HIS DILATORY TACTICS—SENDS TELEGRAM TO PRESIDENT, ASKING IF FEDERAL TROOPS CAN BE CALLED TO COLORADO, AND WOMEN HOLD FORT WAITING ANSWER.

The spirit of militancy swept the women of Denver this morning. It swept a mighty mass meeting of 500 women and nearly 200 men gathered to protest against the sorry dilly-dallying of Gov. Ammons, which has led to bloodshed and the loss of life in the coal fields of southern Colorado.

"Immediate action and no more delay; no more investigation; no more discussion," was the demand of the people. Nor would they be put off. Gov. Ammons played for time. He tried to evade the imperious summons of the meeting to appear before the people and not only listen to their demands but to take action upon them.

But the women would not be put off. They have been patient. They have waited quietly to no end. This morning they were aroused to fever pitch by the news of renewed fighting in the strike district. Gov. Ammons literally was forced to appear before them to listen to their demands for immediate Federal intervention, for the withdrawal of the State troops from the fields and the governor's own presence there, and finally for the arrest of Maj. Hamrock and Lieut. Linderfelt and the investigation of their conduct.

"We demand that the governor here and now shall send a telegram to President Wilson asking for Federal aid," declared Mrs. Robert W. Steele, who headed the mass meeting. "Then a committee of our own women will at once send off that telegram. Nothing less will satisfy us."

DEMAND THAT GOVERNOR ASK FOR FEDERAL AID.

Again the governor played for time. He insisted that he had received word from Congressman TAYLOR that the President refused to grant aid. He was interrupted by Mrs. Steele.

"I have authority for the statement that the telegram which has been given out is not correct," she declared. "The telegram which really was sent stated that the matter had been seriously considered by the President and his Cabinet, but no action could be taken unless the governor himself asked for aid."

Gov. Ammons protested that he could not "affront the President" by asking for aid unless he was assured that the first telegram was incorrect. He begged the women to adjourn and give him an opportunity to ascertain which was correct.

AMMONS'S PLEA DROWNED WITH HISSES OF WOMEN.

His plea was drowned with shouts and hisses. "No, no!" cried the women. "We're going to stay here until we get what we want."

"How could a demand for Federal aid be an affront to the President if he is so anxious to help us?" asked Mrs. Steele in quiet dignity.

The governor openly squirmed and finally agreed to at once send his message to Washington asking which telegram was correct.

"And we'll wait here until you give us an answer," shouted the women as he hurried off, with a bodyguard of Lieut. Gov. Fitzgarrald and two plain-clothes men from the police department, Peter Carr and P. J. O'Connor.

Long before 10 o'clock, the hour set for the gathering of the women to protest against the dilatory policy of Gov. Ammons, which they declare is directly responsible for the Ludlow massacre as well as the later fighting, women began to assemble in the rotunda of the capitol.

WOMEN FROM THE HILL MINGLE WITH WORKERS.

There were women from capitol hill, women from business offices, wives of laborers and workingmen. It was a representative crowd, and from the lips of all the women came determined words.

This once they would assert their power as citizens and voters to the fullest extent. Women and children had lost their lives in the strike district. And it was the sons and brothers and husbands of these women who had been sent down to Ludlow to bring about peace at the risk of their lives.

By 10 o'clock the halls of the capitol were crowded, with the leaders standing in the rotunda of the building. Promptly at the hour, Mrs. Robert W. Steele, chosen at the mass meeting on Thursday to head the demonstration, and Mrs. Alma Lafferty, president of the Woman's Peace Organization, which first called the meeting, stepped to the head of the ranks of women.

"HERE TO DEMAND END OF CIVIL WAR," SAYS LEADER.

"Women of Denver," cried Mrs. Lafferty, "we are gathered here to-day on very serious business. We are not here to take sides in this terrible trouble between the strikers and the operators. But we are here to demand of the governor that he at once take steps to bring this civil war to an end. We are not accusing anyone, but we want action at once, and let us stay here until we get it."

"We're going to stay," shouted the women, cheering and waving their handkerchiefs.

"I ask you to be quiet and dignified in presenting these demands," urged Mrs. Lafferty. "We want to act with credit to all the women of the State. Let us go forward with the quietness of despair."

Headed by Mrs. Steele, the women marched toward the governor's office. At the door they were stopped by Jackson, the governor's messenger.

"The governor asks you to go to the chamber of representatives," they were told. "All of you can't get in here."

FORCE PROMISE THAT THE GOVERNOR WILL APPEAR.

"Will the governor come up there?" asked the women, and not until they were assured that he would come before them would they leave the office, which was literally besieged.

Once gathered in the house of representatives, the women opened their meeting with the singing of "America." There were tears in the eyes of many of them, and the word was passed from lip to lip, "Remember the women and children who died at Ludlow."

"I will appoint a committee of women to wait upon the governor and demand his presence," announced Mrs. Lafferty. "Will Mrs. Herlinger, Mrs. Stuart D. Walling, Mrs. Evangeline Heartz, and Mrs. J. J. Ryan inform him that we are waiting for him?"

As the committee withdrew someone started singing the "Battle Hymn of the Republic," and in a few minutes the chamber was ringing with the martial song.

AMMONS GETS GUARD BEFORE GOING TO MEET.

For half an hour Ammons kept the women waiting while he sent for Chief O'Neill, two plain clothes men, and several traffic policemen to guard him and to preserve order.

"Why are these men allowed to enter the governor's chambers and confer with him when we are waiting?" the women demanded.

"Why, they're officers of the law," spoke up some one, "and, besides, the governor is talking with D. W. Brown on the telephone and considers that more important than conferring with the women."

Finally the committee of women were admitted. The governor was seated at his desk with Fitzgarrald by his side and the two policemen on guard.

"Gov. Ammons," said Mrs. Robinson, "we are here simply to escort you to the chamber above and to ask your immediate presence there. The women wish to present some resolutions to you."

The governor cleared his throat, then asked if the committee could not present the resolutions. "I have important matters to attend to, ladies," he said. "I have just received word that there is fighting going on at three mines down in the strike district. The attorney for the mine workers is waiting to confer with me. There are steps which must be taken immediately to prevent loss of life. I have no time to listen to resolutions."

WOMEN HOLD GOVERNOR TO PROMISE TO APPEAR.

"We, too, represent those who are desirous of preventing loss of life," he was told. "Gov. Ammons, as the State's chief executive you owe it to the women of Colorado to appear before them. We are here to help you, but we were assured before retiring upstairs that you would appear at the meeting."

"Good God, there's firing going on down there," cried Fitzgarrald, waving his hands. "The governor will come to you when the firing ceases."

"I have just until noon to arrange these important matters," pleaded the governor. "Can't you wait until then?"

"We will keep you only five minutes," insisted the women, and with a hopeless wave of the hand the governor finally assented.

He was then escorted to the house of representatives, still accompanied by Fitzgarrald and the detectives, with the women following him. As they entered the house all the women arose and shouted, then sat down quietly at a signal from Mrs. Lafferty.

"Gov. Ammons and women of Denver," she said, "we have come here on a peaceful mission. We are not here to take sides in this matter of the strike, but to demand that this dreadful warfare in southern Colorado cease at once. I am pleased to introduce to you Mrs. Robert W. Steele, who will present our demands to the governor."

MRS. STEELE IS CHEERED AS SHE CONFRONTS HIM.

The women arose and waved their handkerchiefs and cheered as Mrs. Steele came forward.

"In the name of humanity and of the women of the State of Colorado and the city of Denver, I present to you these resolutions, Gov. Ammons, adopted at the meeting of the Women's Peace Association on Monday," she said. "We request that you act upon them at once:

"'Resolved, That we demand the immediate intervention of the United States troops in the strike district; that we demand the immediate withdrawal of the State troops from the field and the immediate presence of the governor in that district, in order that he may, as chief executive of the State, bring about peace in that district; and that we demand the arrest of Maj. Hamrock and Lieut. Linderfelt, and that they be brought to Denver so that their conduct may be investigated.'

"Gov. Ammons, I am assured that a telegram from Congressman Taylor which was given out and printed in our newspapers all over the State a few days ago was not the correct telegram which was sent by him.

CORRECT TELEGRAM HELD BACK, SAYS MRS. STEELE.

"The first telegram stated that the congressional delegation had called upon President Wilson and the Cabinet and that Federal aid was considered out of the question. The second telegram, which I am assured was the true one, stated that the matter had been taken up by President Wilson and his Cabinet, that they had spend much time in serious consideration of it, but that nothing could be done unless Gov. Ammons requested aid.

"We therefore ask, Gov. Ammons, that you here and now write out a message to Wilson, asking for aid, and that Mrs. Lafferty then appoint a committee of women to see that the telegram immediately is sent off."

WOMEN SHOUT AS BLANK IS HANDED TO GOVERNOR.

The house fairly shook with applause and deafening shouts as Mrs. Steele finished and handed a telegram blank to the governor. Mrs. Lafferty stepped forward, asking if she might appoint a committee, but the governor shook his head and stood up.

"Ladies," he said, "while in Washington I took up the matter of Federal intervention with the President. It wasn't the first time. Early last winter, when affairs here reached a crisis, I made inquiries as to the possibility of intervention in case the State should be unable to handle the situation, and was given very discouraging reports.

"When I left for Washington a week ago Tuesday I went in the fullest confidence that there would be no more trouble in the strike district. By the time I had reached there the Mexican situation was very acute. President Wilson and the Cabinet were engrossed in the consideration of it.

"Then I got word of the trouble here. Not until last Tuesday night did I get anything very definite. At that time I could not see the President, but took up with the members of the investigating committee sent out here from Congress, and also with our own congressional delegation, the matter of intervention.

ATTEMPT TO PUT OFF WOMEN HISSED DOWN.

"When the situation became so acute I left for Denver. On the road I received a telegram stating that the congressional delegation from this State had interviewed the President and that there was no hope of Federal intervention. That is the telegram which was given out. If I was not correct, I want to know it. Before going any further I would like to telegraph to Washington and find out what is correct. It will take only a few hours, and if you will adjourn until to-morrow morning"——

The governor was not given an opportunity to complete his sentence, which was drowned out by the shouts of protestation.

"We're going to say right here," cried the women.

The governor looked around helplessly, then spoke again.

"I was assured when I came up here that you were to help me," he said. "God knows I need help. I don't need anything else. I have used what little ability I have to serve this State and to bring about an adjustment in this matter.

WANTS COMMITTEE TO GET FACTS IN CASE, HE SAYS.

"I have had only a few hours to get in touch with the situation. I am trying to organize a committee, headed by the chief justice of the State, to go down South and make investigations and find out what are the facts in the case. When we know the facts, then we can act, and no one will demand a more speedy punishment of the guilty parties if they are found than I will.

"I didn't go to bed last night until 2 o'clock, when I tried to get a little sleep. But I couldn't sleep at all, and got up at 5. Since I went into office I have spent on an average of 16 hours a day at my desk. And I am willing to spend every hour of every day of the coming weeks in the effort to adjust this matter without further bloodshed. Until you give me a good chance, I ask you as good citizens to give me your help and support. Give me an opportunity, an opportunity. I can't do anything unless I have public sentiment back of me."

WOMEN SING AS THEY WAIT ANSWER TO TELEGRAM.

The women, while refusing to adjourn, consented to wait until the governor could send off his telegram. They spent several hours singing songs and listening to the speeches of women who had been down in the strike district.

Here is the report as it appeared in the Rocky Mountain News and Times of April 26:

DETERMINATION OF MOTHERS, WIVES, AND DAUGHTERS BRINGS APPEAL OF GOVERNOR TO STOP KILLING STRIKERS.

(By Mildred Morris.)

A silent army of 1,000 women marched to the house chamber of the capitol yesterday morning. In its ranks were women with babes in arms, white-haired women whose eyes were dimmed by age, working women, women from Capitol Hill, women of all classes and of all ages.

The army summoned the governor of the State to come before it. The governor came. It demanded that he send a telegram to Washington. The telegram was sent. It demanded that he appeal to Washington for Federal troops. The appeal was made.

GOVERNOR OBEYS ORDERS.

Never was there anything like it. These women who ordered the State's chief executive to do their bidding and were obeyed accomplished a great thing, and accomplished it in perfect peace and dignity. There were no threats, no hisses, no jeers. It was an assemblage that gave equal suffrage a new meaning.

The women who came believed they had a solemn duty to perform and they did not go away until they had performed it. Never were there women more deadly in earnest, more grimly determined.

WAIT ALL DAY FOR REPLY.

They stayed, most of them, from 10 o'clock in the morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon waiting for an answer to the governor's first telegram to the President. They sent word down to the executive office that those who could would remain at their posts until the gathering's demands were granted; it mattering not whether they were made to wait all night or all week, they would wait and keep sending their committee with their commands.

There was no impatience. While they kept their vigil they sang "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "John Brown's Body," "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

At 6 o'clock there were still watching women left—150 of them. They were weary, but still grimly determined, women.

"Women, we are making history," said Dora Phelps Buell in ringing tones. "Stay on."

"We will," they cried back.

There was a call for volunteers to keep "the watch fires burning all night" if necessary. All 150 women rose to volunteer.

"We will all stay," they cried. "We will wait until the governor does our bidding."

CHEERS FOLLOW VICTORY.

When their committee came with a message from the governor that he was drafting an appeal for Federal troops they sprang to their feet and made such a demonstration as their tired voices would permit, and then sang "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow."

"Our work is not yet done," said Mrs. Alma Lafferty. "Women, we must wait until we see the draft of the appeal and know that it is sent. Will you wait?"

"We will," came back in chorus.

And they did. Not a woman among them left the statehouse until that appeal was sent.

CONSTANT WATCH KEPT.

In the governor's office waited the committee delegated by the women to carry its commands to the chief executive—its members, Mrs. Robert W. Steele, widow of the late chief justice of the supreme court; Mrs. Alma Lafferty, president of the Women's Peace Association; State Senator Helen Ring Robinson, Mrs. Stuart Walling, and Mrs. John Joseph Ryan. It did not relax its vigil for a moment, not even to eat. It lunched on sandwiches and dined in the governor's anteoffice on oranges and bananas. When the governor returned from his own dinner he found the committee still on the job, tired eyed but cheerful. All day it had followed him like a Nemesis.

Some of the women who waited upstairs went all day without food, not a few of whom were gray-haired women. They would not leave their posts until the draft of the governor's appeal for Federal intervention had been read to them.

NEW DEMANDS ARE PLANNED.

And when they at last dispersed after a 12 hours' vigil, tired to death but triumphant, the 150 watchers made it known that if the President refused Federal aid to end the carnage in the southern coal fields the army of 1,000 women would return and make new demands.

They wanted a cessation of bloodshed in the strike zone, and they would have it. As the mothers of the State, they had awakened to their power and were serving notice on those elected to serve the Commonwealth of Colorado and to remember that there were determined women who, like sentinels, henceforth would be on guard to protect human rights and to prevent the murder of men, women, and children in industrial warfare.

COMMITTEE IMPRESSES GOVERNOR.

The assembly of women apparently was not taken seriously by Gov. Ammons until a committee waited on him to summon him before it.

"We have come, Mr. Governor, to escort you to the house chamber where the women of Denver await you," said Senator Helen Ring Robinson.

"I am very busy, ladies," answered the governor, nervously. "You can tell me what the meeting wants and I will give my answer through you."

"But the women want to hear from you directly, Mr. Governor," said Mrs. Robinson in a quiet tone.

"It is impossible for the governor to leave this office at this time," put in Lieut. Gov. Fitzgarrald. "He can't see these women now."

"BUSY," SAYS GOVERNOR.

"I am kept busy talking over the long-distance phone," said Gov. Ammons. "I am trying to keep peace at one of the mines where there is firing. I can not come."

"Gov. Ammons," said Mrs. Robinson firmly, "the women of Denver summon you. The women of Denver, do you understand?"

"You ought to understand the governor can't come now," put in the lieutenant governor again.

Mrs. Evangeline Heartz, another member of the committee, rose to her feet and pointed her finger at Fitzgarrald.

"Lieut. Gov. Fitzgarrald, the women of Denver are gathered upstairs," she said. "They want to see Gov. Ammons and they will see him. Do you hear?"

WORKING FOR PEACE, HE SAID.

"I am trying to bring about peace and I can only listen to those who want to help me," said the governor.

"The women upstairs are also desirous of bringing about peace," said Mrs. Robinson, "and they have come to help you, Gov. Ammons."

"But don't you see, ladies, I can not leave right now?" pleaded the governor. "I must keep peace at this mine."

WILL WAIT, HE IS TOLD.

"We don't insist that you come right now, if you can not," said Mrs. Robinson; "the women will wait for you. They are patient."

"Better come back this afternoon or some other time," suggested the lieutenant governor.

"Oh, no, Lieutenant Governor," said Mrs. Robinson with a quiet smile. "We will wait until the governor is ready for us to escort him upstairs."

"Just a minute, then," said Gov. Ammons.

AGREES TO MEET THEM.

He went into the inner room and came out directly.

"I am ready to go now," he told the committee, and Lieut. Gov. Fitzgarrald and Detective Peter Carr and T. W. Connor, in plain clothes, walking beside him, the governor followed the committee upstairs.

The second time the committee waited on the governor Mrs. Steele bade him not to forget that the women demanded that he order Maj. Hamrock and Lieut. Linderfelt arrested and brought here to be tried on a charge of murder.

PROMISES INVESTIGATION.

"This shooting at Ludlow is to be investigated and the guilty ones punished," answered the governor. "But how can we try Hamrock and Linderfelt here, even if they were guilty? They'd have to be tried down there. We couldn't possibly try them here."

"Under the Moyer decision you can do anything, Mr. Governor," suggested Mrs. Robinson.

The governor made no answer.

Before 10 o'clock, the hour set for assembling, the women who responded to the Women's Peace Association's call thronged the corridor of the capitol.

"Women, let us proceed in a dignified manner to the governor's office," said Mrs. Alma Lafferty, president of the Women's Peace Association.

MRS. STEELE HEADS LINE.

A line was formed with Mrs. Robert W. Steele at its head. The vanguard was met at the door of the executive offices by Jackson, the governor's negro messenger.

Later, Mrs. Steele, Mrs. Robinson, Mrs. Ryan, and Mrs. Walling composed a committee appointed to remain with Gov. Ammons until he had dictated a telegram to President Wilson.

Mrs. P. T. Hurlinger, wife of a carpenter, was the first member of the committee named. She had her 8-months-old baby with her and carried the little one to the governor's office. Mrs. Robinson, Mrs. Heartz, and Mrs. John Joseph Ryan completed the committee.

About the same time the committee reached the governor's office Detectives Carr and Connor had arrived there, summoned by Chief of Police O'Neill, who was in conference with the governor.

Mrs. Robinson insisted that the Taylor telegram to the governor be verified. On the governor's private telephone she called the Western Union office and had the telegram read to her over the telephone.

Exactly what had the women voters of Colorado done? They had broken all known precedents by compelling a governor of an American State to apply for Federal troops, admitting his own inability to preserve peace and keep order in the State. Never before had such a thing happened. A mass meeting of men could not have accomplished it. Men would have fought each other. Men would have palavered about "State rights" and "Colorado's dignity." But these women wanted the strike to stop; wanted arson, murder, and pilage to cease.

"THEIR'S NOT TO REASON WHY."

Colorado, Mr. Chairman, as already stated, presents the two biggest of all arguments for woman suffrage. First, the women and children, the homes, suffer first from bad law enforcement, from weak officers, from grasping, grafting capitalists, from men who are careless and irresponsible. They should have the right to vote from simple justice, that they may have an equal opportunity to protect their homes, their children, their dearest rights. Second, the women are competent and efficient in the greatest emergency, in the face of appalling calamity. Instinct tells them how to do the thing, and they do it.

THE WOMEN WILL VOTE IN THE UNITED STATES.

Will the women vote in this country? Yes. Will the State-rights bogey keep them from acquiring and exercising their own human rights? No.

The Democratic Party organization in this Congress may cause delay, but that party will be driven out of power if it continues in the way. That was a time when men declared that women were without souls, and there were antis in that day who opposed the good women who took issue with the clergy; but despite the antis and the reactionaries, the right of women to enter the pearly gates the equal of man was finally admitted, although the masculine gender is supposed to guard all the portals. Women then struggled for the alphabet and the right of rudimentary education, and the reactionary men of that day and the antis denounced the women, who were called "agitators" and "knockers," "dissatisfied with home environment." They burned at the stake and hung on the gibbets in England and other European countries in 10 generations 3,000,000 women who were attempting to advance the cause of womanhood. They called them witches. The women antis used red in those days to scoff at the women who were persecuted for being intelligent or ambitious. The red was a symbol of the fire which would burn the "witches" to death.

Within my own recollection women have struggled for the right to higher education and to work in gainful pursuits to make their own living. The antis were present in all these struggles, like they paraded the streets—a few of them—to-day with their red roses of scorn. But they are like mosquitoes to the American Army at Vera Cruz—some annoyance, it is true, but, after all, they only serve to stir the boys and the country with a desire to hear the word "On to Mexico."

So it will be in this struggle for equal suffrage. The battle is already won in 10 States and in Alaska. Four more will come in line next November. The Eastern States are beginning to line up. The women of America are going to vote soon. No party question will prevent them; no color line will stop them; no State rights issue will deter them; no State has any right to deny to half its citizens the right to share in government by the exercise of suffrage anywhere under the American flag. As citizens of the great American Republic, as members of the American family, and as units of the great American home, we will not permit such a travesty on democracy to exist any longer in this land of equal opportunity.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I in my own right?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman has about five minutes remaining.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought I had more than that. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen can see for themselves the time. The gentleman from Minnesota is ahead now of the gentleman from Georgia about seven minutes, and debate, under the instruction of the House, is to close at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] will proceed.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the Chair to say that debate would close at 4.35 p. m.?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUCKER. I serve notice that it will have to stop at that time or have more Members here to listen to the debate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I can not allow this opportunity to pass without voicing what I believe to be the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of my State of West Virginia in favor of a generous pension policy on the part of our Government toward our old soldiers. It will give me great pleasure to vote for the pending bill, which provides for the appropriation for pensions for the ensuing fiscal year. The only pang of regret I feel is that there are very many who should be the beneficiaries of their country's gratitude who have not yet been able to have their claims adjudicated, and yet who are as justly entitled to pensions as any who are at present on the rolls.

I desire to congratulate such of my Democratic colleagues of the Sixty-third Congress as have decided, as well as such Democrats of the Sixty-second Congress as did decide, that the American people will not stand for any parsimonious, cheese-paring attitude toward the veterans of the Civil War and their dependent heirs. It would be a fitting and magnanimous thing if every Democratic Member of Congress—those of the far South as well as those of the North—in these later days, when the harsh feelings engendered by the fearful realities of civil strife have been tempered by the lapse of many years, would join with us and make the vote upon this bill and upon all similarly well-considered bills absolutely unanimous. I am sorry that the number of Democrats who favor a liberal pension policy is so small. Yet I rejoice that in the last Congress a sufficient number of them joined with the Republicans to pass the Sherwood law. Without the aid of Republicans it would have failed of passage, yet I give full credit to those Democrats who assisted in the passage of that beneficent piece of legislation.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, the Republican Party, reunited, is the natural guardian and conservator of the rights and privileges of the old soldier, and to that party he must always look for steadfast devotion to his interests. There are still those on the Democratic side of this House, and elsewhere, who apparently begrudge every dollar that is taken from the National Treasury to pay this honorable debt to those who offered their lives on the altar of their country in the days following the firing upon Fort Sumter. We hear their railings upon every occasion in this body when a pension bill is before us for consideration.

There is a great difference, Mr. Chairman, between a liberal policy in the making, construction, and administration of our pension laws, such as that adopted by the real friends of the soldier, and a policy of scant acquiescence that has been wrung from their quasi friends by the dictates of political expediency. This difference is plainly apparent to those who have prosecuted pension claims under Republican and under Democratic administrations. We all know that a hint from the Executive, that is so effective in all other respects with his party associates, could tighten or loosen the methods employed by those who administer our pension laws, making it practically impossible, on the one hand, or easily possible, on the other, to get claims adjudicated.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to all raids upon the Treasury. I do not want, nor does any honest man want, anyone granted a pension who is not equitably or legally entitled to it, but in cases of reasonable doubt at this late day, when the Angel of Death is summoning 100 or more of these battle-scarred veterans every 24 hours, and when it is becoming more and more difficult to obtain the evidence required under the stringent and technical rules adopted by an unfriendly majority, I would, Mr. Chairman, resolve those doubts in favor of the old soldier. I would rather a few should get pensions who might not deserve them than by any mischance a single deserving one shall be deprived of this recognition by his Government in his declining years. Let us be liberal, not technical, in our dealing with this subject. The few paltry dollars we can pay the veterans, even under a liberal policy, will not be a tithe of what these heroes deserve at our hands. Let us make the evening of their lives as comfortable as we can, for the day is rapidly approaching when the last one shall have answered the final roll call. A great country such as ours must not be charged with ingratitude.

Mr. Chairman and fellow Members, I want in this connection to make a plea for justice toward a body of men who served their country as willingly and as faithfully as any on the roll of honor of this Republic. I refer to the home guards, the independent State scouts, and those brave auxiliaries of the Army—the teamsters, bridge builders, and railroad repairers of the State of West Virginia. All or most of these men were exposed to great danger in defense of their State and country, storm ridden as it was. They made the same offering of their young manhood that was made by those who served in the volunteer armies, and I want to urge upon you, individually and collectively, that you assist in the enactment into law of the bills I have introduced in this Congress for the relief of these worthy soldiers and helpers—H. R. 9419, H. R. 10157, and H. R. 12118—by placing them upon the muster roll of the soldiers of the late war and by granting them service pensions of $30 per month. These men are now aged, but their arms are outstretched toward their Government, of which you and I form a part, and all that they ask is simple justice. I expect to continue bringing this matter to the attention of the Congress as long as I am a Member of this body, or until these bills or similar ones that accomplish the same object are passed.

Another point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, is this: A great many old soldiers, who have passed the age of 65 and are thus ineligible to take the civil-service examination, are about to be removed from the positions they now hold as fourth-class postmasters. The ruthless hand of the spoilsman is reaching out and depriving these battle-scarred soldiers of the livelihood they have been earning under Republican administrations. I hereby offer my protest against this intolerable injustice. Is faithful service on the battle field to go for naught? Are wounds to go for naught? Are the technicalities of a civil-service examination a better test of fitness for these offices than years of faithful and wholly satisfactory work? Will the rapacity of Democratic office seekers not stop short of this desecration? Will the mere fact that these old soldiers are Republicans or Progressives outweigh all other considerations?

If I had a thousand tongues I should employ them all in a protest against this inhumanity. In this connection I desire to read one of several typical letters I have received from old soldiers who are in fear of having their very bread and butter taken away from them.

PETROLEUM, W. VA., March 28, 1914.

The Hon. HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SUTHERLAND: Yours of the 27th instant just received—relative to the post office here—and I can not understand why I should unjustly be cut out of the office, having been injured in the United States Army in line of duty during the Civil War, and to such an extent as to be refused reenlistment, as the records of the Pension Office will show; and, then, I can not understand why they desire to change from one tried and proving his efficiency, to one untried and without any business training.

I hope they may yet recognize my right as a wounded soldier of the Civil War.

I herewith return the letter of the Hon. First Assistant Postmaster General.

Please excuse me for intruding so much. Thanking you for your kindness, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

GEO. B. DOUGLASS.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, as much has been said upon this floor for and against the old soldier, I do not care to enter into any discussion as to the merits or demerits of any of our veterans. My record in that regard is well known, I think, to all the people of Minnesota and my section, and I think my votes upon the floor of Congress in the last 10 or 12 years have shown conclusively that I am a friend of the old soldier.

We are now about to pass, and I believe unanimously, a bill appropriating $169,150,000 for pensions for our old soldiers, their widows, and their orphans. I, for one, do not believe that that bill is one dollar too large. I agree with the present Commissioner of Pensions, who said that that amount would be necessary in order to properly pay them under the existing laws of the United States.

I wish to pay a compliment in this connection to the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. BARTLETT, of Georgia, who thoroughly investigated the amounts that are required by the Commissioner of Pensions, and the committee, and I will say, the chairman of the committee was heartily in favor of passing this appropriation bill. There was not a dissenting voice in that committee, and I for one believe that the Commissioner of Pensions has carefully investigated it in all respects, and these are the amounts that he suggested.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word concerning a certain branch of our service, and but a word. We have the two large branches of the service, the Army and the Navy, and they are large in comparison to another branch of the service called the Marine Corps. The Marine Corps has received, perhaps, its just deserts, and perhaps not, at the hands of the American Congress. They are small in numbers, but are efficient fighting men in all ways. The beginning of this Marine Corps, as I gather from the records, is as follows: The earliest authentic record of marines in America bears the date of 1740, when three companies were organized in New York under the flag of Great Britain. The parent of the present organization, the first and second battalions of American Marines, was created November 10, 1775, by the Continental Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to go on record as saying that ever since the organization of this, the oldest corps of the service, the Marine Corps, there never has been an instance on this continent or wherever else the American soldier was sent, where the Marine Corps was not the first in action and bore the brunt of the battle in all cases. Such is the case now at present in Mexico. Such it was in China, and such it always has been.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to use two or three minutes of the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH].

The CHAIRMAN. He has no time.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I shall appropriate two or three minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman two minutes of my time.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, if that is all the time I have, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to say anything more about any branch of the service except to say that there is no more efficient service in our Army or Navy than the marines. They are of the highest quality in all respects. You will notice they were the first that landed at Vera Cruz, and they are the first at every place where trouble exists, and they are the first ones to meet the bullets of the enemy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD an article written by Frederic J. Haskin on the subject of the Marine Corps of the United States. I do this because it is put in better and more appropriate language than it is possible for me to do under any circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of the article mentioned. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS.

(By Frederic J. Haskin.)

"The marines have landed and have the situation well in hand." This has been the burden of countless press dispatches from all quarters of the world.

Repetition of this message from scenes of anarchy and disaster has brought the average citizen to regard the United States marine as a mighty efficient fellow. In fact, he has formed the habit upon reading the first part of the sentence, "the marines have landed," to add the last part as a matter of course.

Wherever this country has had need of faithful service and resolute hearts there the marines have been on hand. Not only in the van at this their second occupation of Vera Cruz, the American marines have been foremost for more than 100 years whenever violence has threatened the Nation's interests. They are the skirmish line of Uncle Sam's authority; the first on the spot, the first to land, and the first to engage in actual fighting.

Further than the fact that they generally carry out their tasks beyond all grounds for argument, there is little definite in the popular idea of the marines. The nature of their service, their organization and administration are not matters of general information. To many the marine is a sailor with belled trousers and a peculiar thirst for trouble.

Marines are soldiers trained for service both on land and on ships of war. They are organized, clothed, and equipped much the same as the soldiers of the Regular Army. They are prepared to fight either as infantrymen or as artillerymen. Their corps forms an independent military organization, which is placed directly under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy. In time of war their principal duty is that of cooperation with the Navy.

Absolute mobility is the ideal of their service. The khaki-clad marine is ready upon an instant's notice to start for a rebellion in China or followers of Huerta in Mexico City. There is never any confusion about a mobilization of marines. They are being mobilized continuously, one place or another, to sit on the lid where trouble is brewing. This is one of their specialties.

READY FOR SERVICE ON SHORT NOTICE.

When the occasion arises it is just a matter of an order and a few hours until the needed marines are on their way. They are old hands at campaigning, camp making and camp breaking, skirmishes, battles, and emergency calls to the world's end. Not a year passes but they are called upon this expeditionary work. They are familiar with life in the Tropics and the rigors of northern encampments.

The headquarters of the corps is in Washington, whence the major general commandant and his staff direct the work of the organization. The marines themselves are scattered over the world in cruising battleships, in foreign stations, at various stations throughout this country, at navy yards, prisons, magazines, and with receiving ships. There are at present about 9,872 enlisted men in the corps and 342 officers.

In the past one of the chief duties of the Marine Corps has been expeditionary work, or response to emergency calls for the protection of the interests of the United States or the lives of its citizens in the troubled areas of the world. In the performance of this duty they have landed many times in the countries of South and Central America and of the Orient during periods of turmoil. Since 1900, 38 expeditions of American marines have been sent out, the objective points of which stretch from Mexico to Abyssinia and China.

Other duties of the corps have been to provide detachments of from a dozen men under a sergeant to 60 or more under one or two commissioned officers for service afloat in capital ships; guard duty at naval stations, prisons, magazines, and yards; service with receiving ships and in our foreign possessions, and guard duty at such centers of temporary insecurity as Peking and Managua. A detachment of 320 officers and men of the corps protects the legation in Peking at the present time.

The duty of the corps which has now come to be regarded as the most important is that of advanced base work. This means the seizure and maintenance of ports for an advanced base of fleet operations in times of war. Such was the nature of the recent work of the marines at Vera Cruz, and such their occupation of Guantanamo, Cuba, in 1898. In the latter action a small detachment of them held McCalla Hill for three days without food or adequate water against 6,000 Spanish soldiers.

ONE REGIMENT ON EACH COAST.

Two regiments of about 1,250 men are to be organized and trained for this special purpose. One of these regiments is to be stationed on the Atlantic coast, probably at Philadelphia, while a similar regiment will be stationed on the Pacific coast at Mare Island. At the advance base school in Philadelphia the men are being trained as electricians, gunners, and machinists.

Especial care is taken in the selection of recruits and officers for the Marine Corps. Applicants for enlistment have to undergo strict examinations as to their physical, mental, and moral fitness. The officers are appointed from the Naval Academy, from the ranks, and from civil life. After enlistment the men are given a painstaking training in the work of the corps at recruit camps in Norfolk, Va., and Mare Island.

Marines are excellent shots. This probably explains in large part the effectiveness of their expeditions. Nearly 4,000 members of the corps are ranked as expert marksmen, and their rifle teams make dangerous competitors. Their team won two firsts at the Seagirt meet last year, while a member of the corps won the Seagirt championship match. A team chosen from among the marines on duty at the United States Legation at Peking took first and third places last year, and again last April, in competition with teams from the legation guards of Italy, Austria, Russia, Germany, Great Britain, France, and Holland. Moreover, the marines took first, third, fourth, fifth, seventh, and eighth places in the open championship for north China, May, 1913. This match was won for the third successive year by the marines.

The marine, or the battleship's soldier, was first employed among modern nations by Great Britain for the purpose of quelling insurrections among the riffraff sailors whom she pressed into her service. The employment of infantry on ships of war, however, was probably almost coincident with the fighting ship. In this country the Marine Corps claims to have longer traditions than the Navy. The earliest authentic record of marines in America bears the date of 1740, when three companies were organized in New York under the flag of Great Britain. The parent of the present organization, the "First and Second Battalions of American marines," was created November 10, 1775, by the Continental Congress.

HAVE HAD PART IN ALL UNITED STATES WARS.

The marines took conspicuous parts in the brilliant acts of John Paul Jones. The first battle won by marines was in February, 1777, when 300 of them, under the command of Maj. Samuel Nichols, carried by storm the English forts on the island of New Providence, in the Bahamas. It was the marines who, during the War with Tripoli, formed the bodyguard of Gen. Eaton, American consul at Tunis, on his remarkable march from Alexandria to Derne, 600 miles across the desert. Upon their arrival at Derne the marines stormed the native fortifications, and for the first time in our history raised the Stars and Stripes on a fortress of the Old World. "Tripoli" has since been inscribed upon their banner. The marines fought by land and sea through the War of 1812. Between 1815 and 1836 they fought the Spanish pirates in the West Indies, and in Sumatra were called upon to quell internal riots and to police New York following the great fire of 1835. In 1836, when the Florida war broke out, they joined in the campaigns against the Creeks and Seminole Indians.

From 1846 to 1848 the marines were engaged in the first war with Mexico. They saw service on both east and west coasts, and accompanied Gen. Scott on his march to Mexico City. They took part in the capture of Monterey, San Francisco, Mazatlan, Los Angeles, San Diego, San Jose, San Gabriel, and Guaymas.

On the east coast they took part in the capture of Matamoros, Tampico, Frontera, Tabasco, and Vera Cruz. They were also the first division to enter the Grand Plaza, City of Mexico. This explains the inscription on their banners, "From Tripoli to the halls of the Montezumas." A brigade of marines, 5,500 strong, is now waiting at Vera Cruz. Will they be called upon to march through Mexico again?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized until 4.35 o'clock.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is probably the largest appropriation bill we will be called upon to pass at this session, certainly in time of peace. It carries $169,000,000 for pensions granted by the general law and other laws to the soldiers in the various wars, their widows and their children.

I stated yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that as to the real soldiers—the ones who endured the trials of the march and the camp and the danger and exposure of battle—I have had no objection to giving them a liberal pension, and I have not now. It is only those, Mr. Chairman, who were simply enlisted for 30 or 90 days, who saw no active service, who did not perform any deeds of valor or heroism or service to the country, that I object to granting pensions to and that I have voted against granting pensions to.

This bill, I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, will be passed without serious objection. Every provision in it is to comply with the existing law and to furnish the money to pay the pensions that the law provides for.

I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, namely:

For Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, Army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress, $169,000,000: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 3, by inserting after the figures "$169,000,000" the following: "No part of which shall be paid to any pensioner who has an income equal to $100 per month at the time when the payment of his pension is due, or who has for five years next before the approval of this act continuously resided in a foreign country, unless such pensioner is a native of such foreign country."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

[Mr. RUCKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, is the point of order up before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] reserves the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say, in discussing the point of order at the present time——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule if the gentleman desires.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to be heard on the proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. The point of order, I understand, has been reserved. The precise question embraced in a portion of this amendment has been ruled upon in the Sixty-second Congress by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Judge BOOHER, of Missouri. Two years ago, when the pension appropriation bill was under consideration, it contained a provision that no part of the appropriation should be paid to those residing in a foreign country who were not citizens of the United States. The point of order was made, and it was overruled. I refer the Chair to that precedent. So far as the amendment relates to payment to foreign residents outside of the United States, the amendment is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What part of the amendment does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BARTLETT. I say that two years ago, in the Sixty-second Congress, there was reported from the Committee on Appropriations, in the pension appropriation bill, a provision which said that no part of the money provided for in that bill should be paid to any person residing in a foreign country who was not a citizen of the United States, and the point of order was made to the provision that it was legislation. After argument was had the Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BOOHER, decided that it was in the interest of economy and reduced the amount carried in the bill, and therefore it was in order under the Holman rule, and also was a limitation upon the expenditure of the money. I give the Chair the benefit of the ruling, which I can produce with some little research. So I think the amendment is not subject to a point of order; and as to the merits of the amendment, I will discuss that later.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the point of order having been reserved, I want to say a word about the amendment itself. This amendment is a combination of two amendments that were made to the last appropriation bill in the third session of the Sixty-second Congress. The second part of the amendment in particular is a very important feature to pensioners of this country. In 1893 Congress passed a law forbidding the payment of pensions to persons not citizens of the United States. At that time the report on the bill showed that there were 3,000 persons drawing pensions who were not citizens of the United States, and the amount they drew was $350,000. That was in 1893. In 1912, when this amendment was reported for a second time by the Appropriations Committee, the number of foreign pensioners had grown to 5,405, and the amount of the pensions they drew had grown to $967,000.

Now, one argument that was made in favor of paying pensions to foreign pensioners was that there were a few widows in Ireland whose husbands had died on the field of battle in the Civil War. I submit to this House that that does not account for the increase of foreign pensioners from 1893 to 1912 from 3,000 to 5,000, and an increase of money from $350,000 to over $900,000.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. No; the gentleman has made one stump speech.

Mr. WILLIS. That is hardly a fair statement.

Mr. BORLAND. We are making payments to men who have renounced their American citizenship and are no longer citizens of this country. That is the only explanation that can be made in the increase of pensioners since 1893 upon foreign soil. This sentiment is favored by those who stand with the gentleman from Ohio and make political capital out of the payment of Federal money to pensioners. [Applause.] The Pension Department stated that in the case of these foreign pensioners there was absolutely no way to tell when the pensioner died; there was no way to tell whether the right person got the money; no way to convict a man of fraud if he got money that did not belong to him; there was no way for the Government to safeguard the payment of these pensions. Now, we have $967,000 paid out every year of the taxpayers' money. You have no way to safeguard that; you must trust to luck that some of it will get into the hands of those to whom it belongs. No American law can reach the payment of that money, and at least two-thirds of it goes into the hands of people who, since 1893, have become nonresidents and in many cases noncitizens of the United States.

This amendment ought to be adopted in fairness and justice to the taxpayers of the United States, in fairness to the old soldiers who stand by the old flag, and if any man is entitled to fair treatment it is the soldier who stands by the colors that pays him the pension.

There is no reason, no justice, in paying nearly a million dollars of the people's money every year into the hands of foreigners. I undertake to say that of the pensionable widows living in Ireland in 1893, not 50 per cent are living to-day. If they are, this law safeguards those people. The gentleman from Missouri has made his amendment so that if the pensioner is a native of a foreign country he continues to draw his pension, and therefore these widows whose husbands fell on the field of battle will not be cut off by the amendment, but it will reach only the class that it ought to reach, and the payment to whom is indefensible, the ones that have renounced their American citizenship and are no longer supporters of the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment again reported as it now reads?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported as modified.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. Has the point of order been made?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the point of order has been reserved by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. GOOD. After the point of order is disposed of I desire to address myself to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, has the Chair any doubt about the amendment being in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that one phrase in the amendment is subject to the point of order and the other is not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, is it not merely a limitation upon an appropriation; and, in the next place, is it not clearly in order under the Holman rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks one of the paragraphs in the amendment is. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the whole proposition is in order under the Holman rule. Is the point of order made that it changes existing law?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. One part of it at least is subject to the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman in what respect?

Mr. DAVIS. I think the fore part, in regard to the income of $100, is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as to that, the Chair, in using his common sense, would know that that would tend to reduce expenditures, under the Holman rule.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe that it has been decided that it must appear upon the face of the amendment itself that it does reduce expenditures, and in this case it certainly does not.

Mr. RUCKER. It does so appear upon its face.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have not the Holman rule before me just now, and it is difficult, even as often as I have been over it, to hold the exact provisions of it in mind, but it does seem to me that it is clearly inferable from the face of this amendment that it would reduce expenditures, and, therefore, that that part of it also is in order under the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that the intent of the Holman rule is to apply in the necessary administration of government, and that it would apply in a case of this character where it would tend to reduce the expenditures of the Government. It would therefore apply to the portion relating to those who have an income of $100; but the Chair does not think it would apply to those who happen not to live in this country; that that is clearly new legislation, not affecting the subject matter relating to the necessary administration of government.

The Chair thinks if individual pensions could be cut off that a logical conclusion must follow that an amendment cutting out all pensions would be by such construction in order.

The Chair realizes, and doubtless the committee does, that every rule must have wholesome exception, and it occurs to the Chair that is such exception to the Holman rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, what about the matter of limitation? It is a limitation on this particular appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Holman rule cover that question?

Mr. RUCKER. If we cut out the pensions of those who live in foreign countries it certainly reduces the amount.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard upon the point of order to make a suggestion to the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will indulge the gentleman.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rule, an amendment offered to an appropriation bill which manifestly and upon its face would change existing law is not in order. The law of May 11, 1912, provides a pension for all honorably discharged soldiers of the United States Army who served in the Civil War for 90 days or more who have attained a certain age. No exceptions are made in that law. It is on the statute books. This amendment makes a radical change in the law. While it might reduce expenditures, and manifestly upon its face in both these particulars it would reduce expenditures, yet it changes an existing public law in two particulars. In the first place, the law is changed as to all pensioners who are in receipt of $100 a month from any source whatsoever. The law is changed with respect to all pensioners who happen to be absent from the United States for a period of five years. I therefore think that it is manifestly in violation of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the Chair was going to state that he thinks one of these phrases in the amendment is out of order, and that would necessarily compel him to rule the entire amendment out, but he would prefer in this instance to follow the precedents heretofore followed by the House, and therefore will overrule the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the adoption of an amendment such as this would be a disgrace to the country. The men who fought the battles for the preservation of the Union are entitled to better consideration than this amendment would give if it were adopted. The granting of a pension to any man who served the country in the time of its direst need is doing no favor whatever to the man who draws the pension. It is a duty and obligation the Government owes to the man who made it possible for us to live here [applause] in a Nation covered by a single flag. It matters not what the income of the man who served in the war may be. That ought not to determine the question whether he is entitled to a pension. The record of his services is the thing upon which the pension is granted, and not upon the question of whether he is able to earn $100 a month over and above what he may draw from the Public Treasury as a pensioner. The pension is simply a badge of honor for the services he rendered to his Government when it needed men. Who inquired how much income a man had when he volunteered for the war? The question then was, not what is his earning power, but is he fit to be a soldier.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I refuse to yield; I only have five minutes. Men do not seek pensions because in many cases they need the money. They seek pensions because they wish to have that certificate of honor of service rendered to their country. There is no greater service that a man can render to his nation than that of offering his life in days of need, in days of danger. We have heard patriotic speeches on the floor of this House during the past five or six days because 17 or 18 of our boys were killed at Vera Cruz, and it was very proper they should be made; they encourage those who are facing the enemy. But why discriminate against the man because he happens to be successful, because he happens to be alive after the result of his services to his country? Why discriminate against a man because he happens to have other income? Are you opposed to thrift? The question embodied in this amendment is to penalize a man's success, to say that it is not respectable to be successful—that only paupers need apply. The only question for consideration before this House should be, Ought the man who served the country when it needed his services, who has an honorable discharge, who gave all he had in the defense of his Nation and the honor of its flag, to receive a pension? If he rendered the service and the record justifies it, the pension ought to be granted without condition; but any condition sought to be imposed on any man who has an honorable discharge as a result of his services to his Nation in time of war is an insult to the patriotism of the American people. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I protest against the adoption of any such amendment to this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, this amendment should not prevail. It is unjust, it is manifestly absurd, it is ingeniously cruel to cut off the pension of an American citizen whose business has taken him away from his native country for five years.

Mr. RUCKER. It does not.

Mr. TAGGART. It does it, and I am right about it. The message we would send perhaps to a hero of Gettysburg who might be in the City of Mexico protecting his family and who might have been there for the past five years is this: "That inasmuch as you are not a native of Mexico and because you have lived there for the past five years your pension is cut off." If he were a Mexican, we would not cut his pension off. The Mexican who goes back to Mexico can draw his pension, but the American citizen, perhaps, whom he is trying to murder, has his pension cut off under this amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGGART. I will read the language of the amendment so there will be no "ifs" and "ands."

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman ought to do so to avoid some of the mistakes he has made.

Mr. TAGGART (reading):

No part of which shall be paid to any pensioner who has an income equal to $100 per month at the time when the payment of his pension is due, or who has for five years next before the approval of this act continuously resided in a foreign country.

And listen.

Unless such pensioner is a native of such foreign country or has become a citizen of a foreign country.

If he is a native of a foreign country or a citizen of a foreign country you pay him a pension. If he still retains his loyalty to the old flag, and did not renounce his citizenship, but has resided five years in a foreign land, you cut off his pension by this amendment. It is manifestly absurd and unjust. The refusal to pay a pension to a man who is in receipt of $100 a month means simply this, that we consider a pension a gratuity, a crumb from the rich man's table, handed down to some poor Lazarus who has come to receive it. That is not the meaning of a pension to a volunteer soldier of the United States, nor has it ever been. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGGART. I will.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not the actual practice, though, and is it not true, that every Member of this House almost who comes before the Military Affairs Committee to get a record corrected uses as his principal argument the present condition of the would-be pensioner?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes; and I accept the rebuke from the gentleman, inasmuch as I went before the same Military Committee, and the gentleman with the utmost kindness listened to me and granted a favorable report in the case of a widow of a soldier with a defective record, where that widow had been reduced to poverty and the pension had been rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was good, though.

Mr. TAGGART. Yes. Now, you are going to characterize the 450,000 men who fought under this flag the same as you did that poor suffering widow who was the wife of a deserter. They are not in the same category, and they are not before this House in the same light. I am opposed to this idea of putting a penalty upon either the resources or the character, the frugality or the industry, of a man who not only fought for the flag but made an industrious citizen afterwards. [Applause.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. TAGGART. I will yield again.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the gentleman believe that one who fought for his country, as the gentleman says, in the late Civil War, should renounce his country and become a citizen of another country and still draw a pension from our Government?

Mr. TAGGART. Now, I will take the liberty of asking another question, and I will not only put it to you, but to anybody else who favors this amendment. How many pensioners on the pension roll of the United States have renounced their allegiance to the United States? Who are they, where are they, and how many of them are there? Nobody has said one word about it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAGGART. For a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this amendment provide that where a man has renounced his allegiance to the United States and becomes a citizen of another country he will actually forfeit his pension?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAGGART. It all depends upon this phrase: "Or has become a citizen of a foreign country."

If that phrase is thrown in right after the main part of it, it would cut out anybody who had become a citizen of a foreign country. But I contend that the number of persons who have done that is very small.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the gentleman will agree that if any man who now lives abroad has rendered service to the United States, but is on the pension roll, he ought to get that pension.

Mr. TAGGART. Yes, sir; I think so.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] says that under the present plan there is no way of telling whether he does get a pension or not, or when he dies.

Mr. TAGGART. I do not think there would be any great difficulty about that. The postal system of the United States will reach him. He signs a receipt for the pension. Here it is a question of the identification of the signature. There is no more difficulty in seeing that it reaches him than in seeing that your check might reach him, or that his banker might identify his indorsement upon that check. When he dies perhaps there might be more difficulty than if he died in the United States. But we can manage it. We have done harder things than that.

Mr. COX. Could not our foreign consuls look this matter up?

Mr. TAGGART. I imagine that if they took their heels down from the table and laid aside their cigars for awhile they could look the matter up.

This reduces a pension to a beggar's portion, and I am opposed to it; and for and in behalf of the nearly half million of men who sustained this flag I protest against it, and I will vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this same provision, in part, was before the last Congress. The last pension appropriation bill contained a provision which provided that no part of the sum appropriated in that bill for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, should be used to a pay a pension to any person who resided in a foreign country or who was a citizen of a foreign country.

That provision was stricken out on a roll call in the House. That is exactly the same language that was written in the law during the second term of President Cleveland, and after it had been the law for two years Judge Lochren, a Democrat, who was administering the office of Commissioner of Pensions, wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, which I placed in the RECORD last year and which I will read in part now. In that letter Judge Lochren said:

A clause of chapter 187 of the public acts of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress provides:

"That from and after July 1, 1893, no pension shall be paid to a nonresident, who is not a citizen of the United States, except for actual disabilities incurred in the service."

I respectfully ask your attention to this clause, in the hope that you may recommend its repeal. It causes great trouble and annoyance to the excepted classes, who constitute the great bulk of nonresident pensioners, in compelling them to make proof that they belong to these excepted classes. And the final result is that payments under it are withheld from but few, save widows and dependent mothers, who have little else for their maintenance. The saving is too little to offset the suffering inflicted in individual cases. If all nonresidents were refused payments of pension some plausible argument might be made in support of such policy; but none can be urged in favor of this law, which, while giving annoyance to all, strikes only the most helpless.

I should not feel warranted in asking attention to this law but for the fact that it entails much work on this bureau, in answering communications, and seems to yield little practical results except annoyance and apparent cruelty. I recognize to the fullest extent that my sole duty is to execute and administer the laws as they are enacted—fairly and honestly interpreted.

Very respectfully,

WM. LOCHREN,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. GOOD. I regret I can not yield.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman indicate what he was reading from?

Mr. GOOD. From a copy of the letter of Judge Lochren that I read last year, and is found in the RECORD of February 18, 1913, page 3357. You will notice that he says no plausible argument "can be urged in favor of this law, which, while giving annoyance to all, strikes only the most helpless. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, when the call to arms came did this country ask whether the men who supported the flag and joined the Union forces in support of the Union were American citizens or citizens of Great Britain or of Ireland? And when we passed the Sherwood pension law did we ask that question? Did we ask whether or not these men who were to receive pensions were voters in the United States?

Oh, this cheap bid for votes will find no response in the hearts and minds of the 100,000,000 of our countrymen. [Applause.]

The Sherwood pension law was bottomed upon the sound principle of service. This provision, going much further than the amendment of last year, provides that no soldier, no matter where he lives, if he has an income of $100 per month, shall receive a pension. It goes even further than that. It strikes from the pension roll every soldier living abroad who is a citizen of this country and has lived abroad for five years, no matter whether he receives his pension to-day because of wounds incurred in the line of battle or not. We have hundreds, aye, thousands of men on our pension roll to-day, some of them foreigners and some of whom live abroad, who are pensioned because of disabilities received in line of duty. This provision would prevent them from receiving a single penny in the way of a pension.

Pass this amendment, if you like, but never again say that your side of the House is in favor of pensions to the old soldiers. [Applause.] Pass this amendment, if you will, but never again on the public rostrum say that you are in favor of pensions to old soldiers for service, but say instead that you are in favor of a pension to a pauper. Place your support of pensions to old soldiers on a pauper basis, if you will, but never again refer to that bill which bears the name of that brave general who represents a constituency on the floor of this House and whose name was attached to that great bill as a service-pension bill. In the future say that it was a pension for paupers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this provision ought to be defeated by practically the unanimous membership of this body. This amendment has no place in a pension bill at this time.

Think of it! As Judge Lochren said in that report, the men and women from whom you will withhold pensions, the class who will be excluded, are the very class that need the pensions the most. True they live in other countries, where perhaps they can live more cheaply than they can in this country. As was well said by the gentleman from Missouri, many of these pensions are paid to widows living in Ireland, who gave sons or fathers to the cause of the Union. They may have become citizens of the United States and returned to their native country; and now if we adopt this amendment we shall send to them the message that they can no longer receive a pension. To the other provision of the amendment we say to the man who is frugal, the man who is industrious, but who may have given four of the best years of his life to the defense of his country, and his country's flag, "If your income is $1,200 a year, you can not receive one penny of a service pension."

Pass this amendment, if you will, but let it be known that it is the pension program of that side of the House, that this is the plan of Democracy as to the principle on which pensions should be granted and paid. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. On which side of the amendment does the gentleman desire to speak? All the speeches that have been made have been against it. The Chair wishes to alternate, if possible.

Mr. GRAY. I want to make a speech against this amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no pension shall be paid to any person out of this appropriation who is receiving a salary or wage in excess of $2,000 per annum, whether paid annually, monthly, or at other periods, except such person be on the pension roll for actual disabilities received in the service; Provided further, That no pension shall be paid to any person out of this appropriation who is receiving or has an income other than in the last preceding proviso that amounts to more than $2,000 per annum, or who owns property, real or personal, in excess of $10,000, except such person be on the pension roll for actual disabilities in the service; Provided further, That no pension shall be paid to any person out of this appropriation who resides in a foreign country and is not a citizen of the United States, except such person be on the pension roll for actual disabilities in the service or as the widow of a soldier.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 3432. An act to reinstate Frank Ellsworth McCorkle as a cadet at United States Military Academy.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 4057. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4552. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4352. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4260. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4168. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 661) for the relief of the widow of Thomas B. McClintic, deceased, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BRYAN, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, and Mr. CRAWFORD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that, in compliance with the provisions of House concurrent resolution No. 39, the Vice President had appointed Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. BRADY as the committee on the part of the Senate to attend the exercises to held in Brooklyn, N. Y., May 11, 1914, in honor of the men of the Navy and Marine Corps who lost their lives at Vera Cruz, Mexico.

PENSIONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] desire to address the committee?

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to address the committee, but if the gentleman makes a point of order I will say that this substitute is in the precise words of an amendment which was held in order on February 18, 1913, when the last pension bill was under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Without discussing that proposition, the Chair is inclined to think, in his own mind, that both are out of order; but as the Chair ruled the other in order, he will hold this also to be in order. The Chair will state that he ruled the other in order because of the precedents.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has made a very eloquent and touching speech about the widows in Ireland. I thought if we let him go long enough, either he or the gentleman from Ohio would make that speech about the widows in Ireland. Now, in this substitute I have taken care of the widows in Ireland, and not a widow in Ireland will lose her pension by virtue of this amendment. Therefore the political activity of widows in Ireland as a political asset of gentlemen in the Northern States will cease. They will no longer be a political asset to those gentlemen.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. No; not at this particular time.

Mr. GOOD. I want to ask what you have done about the voters?

Mr. BORLAND. Just at this particular moment I will not yield. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was a member of the subcommittee which reported this pension bill two years ago, and he knows the facts which were developed at that time, that I referred to here a few minutes ago, that the amount paid to foreign pensioners had increased 300 per cent in 20 years. In 1893 it was $350,000. It is now $967,000, and I know that that increase is not accounted for by the widows in Ireland. I have a suspicion that a large amount of that increase is accounted for by old soldiers who have gone to western Canada and have renounced their American citizenship for the purpose of becoming homesteaders upon Canadian lands, and are now there voting in Canada. I rather suspect that we are furnishing a large amount of the living expenses of men who are trying to develop that boom country in western Canada. I undertake to say that a very large per cent of the $967,000 has gone in that direction.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Of the 5,495 pensioners, 2,879 reside in Canada.

Mr. BORLAND. More than 50 per cent of the foreign pensioners are citizens of Canada, so that the widows-in-Ireland proposition is exploded now for good. There is no more political asset in the appeal to the sentiment in favor of the widows of Ireland. It gets down to a plain proposition that you gentlemen must face on that side of the House, whether you are willing to expend the money of the American people, the money of the old soldiers who are in this country, as well as others, in the payment of pensions to men who have renounced and abandoned their country.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The question is, Did the men who are living in Canada or any other country in the world serve the United States as soldiers during the Civil War?

Mr. BORLAND. That is not the question.

Mr. MADDEN. And have they an honorable discharge?

Mr. BORLAND. That is not the question, the gentleman who is familiar with the pension laws knows that all countries have adopted a policy to pay men who have incurred disability in the service. We have gone beyond that and we not only pay men who incur disability in the service but we pay those who are not disabled. We have gone beyond the point of disability which is the real foundation for pensions. The man who lost an arm or a leg or has shattered health or constitution from service to his country is entitled to something from his country. That is no gratuity. But when you go beyond that and pay men simply because of service, then you are doing what no civilized country has ever done or does to-day, and when you go still further and do what these gentlemen urge, take the money of your citizens to pay it to the men living abroad who are not American citizens and who have not incurred disabilities in the service, you are doing something that no country ever did and which nobody undertook to defend. It was never proposed in any legislative body in the world except this body, that pensions should be paid to men who had incurred no disability and who had renounced their flag.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am amazed at the attitude of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. Does he forget that this country is also the only great country in the world that does not constantly maintain a large standing army, but always depends in a time of emergency upon the volunteer soldier?

Many of the old soldiers who are living in Canada to-day and are drawing a small pension from the United States are men who volunteered, who offered their services and best years of their lives to their country; and if now they can better their material condition or improve it in any way by moving to Canada, the gentleman from Missouri would cut off their pensions and any recognition for the services rendered to their country.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. For a question.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is his intention to remain here during the war?

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Would the investigation of 450,000 cases to ascertain whether or not every pensioner on the pension roll might be receiving $2,000 a year or more, or who might have joined the Dominion of Canada and might have forfeited his pension—would not these investigations cost more than would be saved by this amendment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I thank the gentleman from Kansas for calling my attention to that. The fact is that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri prevails it will accomplish the purpose that he has in view. It will delay the payment of pensions of more than half of the men who are to-day drawing pensions. Many of them, while they are proving that they do not receive an income of $2,000 a year independent of their pension, will probably pass to the great beyond, while investigators for the Pension Bureau are endeavoring to find out whether they are entitled to pensions at all that the Sherwood bill intended that they should have and that all the pension laws enacted since 1862 intended they should have.

Mr. RUCKER. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. CAMPBELL. To the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BORLAND.

Mr. RUCKER. I introduced the amendment, and I do not wish to be lost sight of.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The amendment and the substitute should be defeated in the interest of just pensions to soldiers who served their country when it needed their services.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have always taken very liberal ground upon this pension matter, and the district which I have the honor to represent has sustained me in that, but I have heard so often and so often of this matter of a pension certificate being a certificate of honor that I confess I have grown somewhat aweary of the story. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], with whom upon a great many questions I am in agreement, made quite an impassioned speech upon that question and insisted that gentlemen who did not need a pension were drawing it because of the fact that it was a certificate of honor. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present what I conceive to be a certificate of honor in connection with the pension matter. During the Spanish-American War a young man went out and served as a soldier from one of the counties in the district that I have the honor to represent. He contracted disease, rheumatism, for which, when he made application, he was granted a pension. He drew that pension for some years, just how long I do not know, but when his quarterly check went to him for the quarter ending November 4, 1913, he addressed the following letter, a copy of which I hold in my hand, to the Commissioner of Pensions:

BROWNSVILLE, TENN., November 10, 1913.

BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C.,

GENTLEMEN: I herewith surrender my pension, as I feel my condition is such I no longer am entitled to it. Also return last check sent me.

Yours, very truly, W. BEN MARTIN.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall take the liberty of reading the reply of the Commissioner of Pensions, in order that this young man's record may appear fully. It is as follows:

NOVEMBER 18, 1913.

Mr. W. BEN MARTIN, Brownsville, Tenn.

DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of the 10th instant transmitting a check for $18 in payment of your pension certificate No. 1129432 for the quarter ending November 4, 1913, and your pension certificate. You state that your condition is such that you believe you are no longer entitled to a pension and you therefore surrender your pension certificate and the check above mentioned. In response I have to advise you that in accordance with your request the check, dated the 4th instant, for $18 has been canceled and your name has been dropped from the pension roll.

I have examined the records in your pension case and find that you had a very creditable service from May 24, 1898, to February 13, 1899, during the War with Spain, and that you contracted rheumatism and resulting disease of the heart during the service.

I congratulate you upon the stand that you have taken. You were very patriotic enlisting in the service, and the Government had need of just such brave and loyal men as you were, and now your voluntary relinquishment of the pension is an additional evidence of your patriotism and loyalty, and entitles you to the thanks of all good men. It would be very gratifying, indeed, if everybody who is receiving a pension who honestly and conscientiously knows that it ought not to be given to them would take the same action that you have. I honor you and praise you for it.

Very truly, yours,

G. M. SALTZGABER, Commissioner.

[Applause.]

I regard that letter of Mr. Martin as a certificate of highest honor. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to war, but as long as we have war I am in favor of pensions. The average age of the soldier of the Civil War is past 70 years. His allotment of three score years and ten has more than expired. He is standing upon the verge of the grave, listening for the bugle of time to call him to the great beyond. His final summons is past due. Time has invaded his home. His family is gone, and he is alone, hovering over the cold ashes of age in the bleak winter of life. Impelled by vicissitudes rather than choice, he has left the country for which he fought in the vigor of young manhood, to live with a son, or a daughter, or a grandchild, or to pass his few remaining days with some relative or friend of his boyhood in the land of his birth. If you ask why he does not stay in a soldiers' home, I answer, because it is not home. He would rather go back to a log house with a dirt floor and sleep on a bed of straw and live with his children, with his old-time neighbors, to be buried in his own churchyard among the graves of his family and departed friends.

I am opposed to taking away the pensions of these old soldiers. I believe that once a soldier of this Nation always a soldier of this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to these amendments which have been offered to this bill. Without impugning the motives of anyone, or without even suggesting that my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who gratuitously assumed that I was making a political speech, was undertaking to make a political speech himself, I want to say that I do not believe this is the time to legislate upon this great question. The very fact that these two amendments which have been offered are utterly incongruous and inconsistent, and the further fact that probably there are not five Members on the floor at this time who know what the amendments provide, are sufficient reasons for me to form my conclusion that it is not wise or desirable or safe legislation in the interest of the country and of the old soldier to complicate the payment of pensions by the adoption of these amendments.

The question as to whether there ought to be any limitation as to the payment of pensions based upon the amount of income is a very grave question. I have a definite notion about that. I am of the opinion that pensions should be paid as a just obligation of the Government to its faithful and patriotic defenders, and as an honorable recognition of the services of heroic men fighting for the flag. The granting of a pension is not a gratuity, neither is it an act of charity; but no matter what I believe, or what others believe, on that proposition, I want to suggest, absolutely without partisan feeling, that it seems to me it is unwise and unfair to the old soldiers to provide that not one single dollar of the pension money appropriated in this great appropriation bill shall be paid unless it shall be ascertained that the pensioner does not have more than a certain amount of income. Neither of the distinguished gentlemen from Missouri has undertaken to provide any means whereby the amount of this income can be ascertained. Unless some means shall be provided in the law for the ascertainment of the soldier's income on pension day, all payment of pensions would be delayed indefinitely, and the old soldiers and those dependent upon them would suffer thereby. In my judgment a soldier is entitled to his pension without being compelled to make oath that he is in need. This Government can not afford to be parsimonious with the fast-disappearing army of 1861–1865.

It is stated in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] that this pension money shall not be paid on any day of payment unless the Commissioner of Pensions shall have ascertained certain facts with reference to the income of the pensioners. Now, gentlemen, stop for a moment and think. What does that mean? Under the present method of paying pensions it means, if the law is to be lived up to, that at least four times a year in some method that the gentleman from Missouri has not indicated in his amendment, and which he could not indicate in an amendment prepared hurriedly and introduced on a great appropriation bill of this kind—in some way the Commissioner of Pensions is to ascertain the monthly income of every pensioner in the country. Now, I insist, gentlemen of the committee, that it is not a practical or just method of dealing with this question, even if the House is determined to abandon the policy which it has already decided upon, namely, that of paying pensions, not only because of wounds received or diseases incurred in the service, but because of age and length of term of service. I recognize the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is perfectly consistent in proposing this amendment, because, as I recall, he has always strenuously and consistently opposed pension legislation based upon age and service, and I am not now questioning his motives as to that, but I am saying to those who believe in the system of paying pensions that is now upon the statute books, that was put there under the leadership of that gallant old soldier who sits across the aisle, my colleague, Gen. SHERWOOD [applause], if you believe in that system of paying pensions, it is unwise, it is unfair to the old soldiers of this country to provide in this slipshod method, in such a way that not even the author of the amendment himself can indicate, that the pension shall be held up until the commissioner shall decide the amount of the income of each pensioner. This great civil strife closed almost a half century ago; the average age of its heroic survivors is over 70 years, and they are fast passing into the great beyond; their fond recollection is the consciousness of service well performed, and a Nation's gratitude well earned. Let us not fail in appreciation at this late hour. I hope these amendments will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, and then the Chair hopes that the committee will be ready to vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of this amendment. I think my colleagues will agree that I have exhibited a very liberal attitude on the subject of pensions since I have been a Member of this House. As a member of a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs that has to do with these matters I have seen that in every case where a man honestly fought for his country and by some mischance or accident had some defect in his record that did not involve moral turpitude, and where the ex-soldier needed the pension, I have always seen that that man went on the pension rolls, because I believe that a man who honestly fought for his country and honestly served his country in time of war ought to be on the pension rolls if by reason of old age or disability incurred in the service he needs help and has no independent support. But I want to call the attention of gentlemen of this committee to the remarkable figures about pensions. We pay $169,000,000, as provided in this bill, for pensions every year. How much do you suppose that all the nations of all the earth pay their ex-soldiers? Would not you think it reasonable to suppose that all the nations of all the earth would pay to their ex-soldiers as much pensions as we pay? The fact is all the nations of all the earth pay but $1,166,000 in pensions. We pay more than one hundred and fifty times as much as England, France, Germany, Russia, and all other nations put together pay. We actually pay to residents in Canada more money in pensions than the Government of Canada pays to its own soldiers in pensions. We pay more in any one week, nay, three times as much in a week, in pensions than all the nations of the earth pay in a year. I say we ought to be liberal toward our old soldiers, but we are carrying our liberality to an absurd extreme when we pay pensions to the rich just as we do to the needy, and to those who have expatriated themselves just as we do to our own citizens.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. We ought to be fair to them, but it does seem to me, in the interest of good government and in the interest of economy and in justice to all our people, we should draw the line somewhere, and why should not we draw that line where it will not hurt? Why not withdraw these bounties to the rich? Why not withdraw them from the aliens? If a man is drawing as much as $2,000 a year in a salary or income, he does not need to be a pensioner upon the Government's bounty, in my humble judgment. If he is patriotic, he ought not to want a pension. If he loves his country, he ought not to measure his love in money at so much per quarter.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman says he intends to be fair in the matter of paying pensions. I notice in the appropriation bill here before the House last year, simply making appropriations to pay the pensions which the law provides, the gentleman voted against that appropriation bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely true and I expect to vote against this bill. I shall vote against any bill that votes the people's money indiscriminately to those who fought for the Union and to those who did not fight for it until years after when they saw the benefits of a pension roll.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman think that is generosity?

Mr. McKELLAR. It may not be generosity, but it is honesty. I think that is entirely fair, for this reason: I do not blame you gentlemen from the North for desiring to give liberal pensions to the deserving and needy old soldiers. I am with you in that. But, when you go further and include in your bills these enormous bounties to men in your districts, the great number of whom could have never heard the artillery roar, nor could never have seen the smoke of battle, then I am against you, for I take it, that none of us really believe that 50 years after the Civil War has closed, there are 450,000 survivors of the Union Army as shown by these pension records, which survivors are still alive. Nature does not extend their lives simply because they were in the Army. Coming from the tenth district of Tennessee, as I do, where my people are very naturally entirely opposed to pensions, which they are taxed to pay and no part of which they receive or ought to receive, I reflect their views and their wishes, as I believe, when I cast my vote against these bills.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. On the other hand, though, whenever it comes to a question of being fair to the soldier who really fought for the Union, I always vote to put him on the pension roll, for I love the Union myself, and admire the patriotism and valor of the men who fought for it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee believe that such legislation as this tends to encourage the patriotism that is needed now in the face of a war with Mexico?

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say to the gentleman, that if patriotism has fallen so low in this country that we have to pay for it in pensions, then God save our country. [Applause.] I want to say to the gentleman that in that part of the country where I come from, from that part of our land that is south of the Potomac River, where we do not receive pensions as they do in the North——

Mr. MADDEN. And where you ought not to.

Mr. McKELLAR (continuing). If we have trouble with Mexico or any other nation, you will find the young men and the old men of our Southland, where we are not paid to be patriotic but where we love our country and our flag, rising as one man to defend the flag of the Republic. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. And at the same time rise as one man to prevent the payment of pensions to the old soldiers?

Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. FESS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to close this debate in 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Move to close it now.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment shall be closed in 10 minutes, and if I do not get unanimous consent I am going to move to close debate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent to close the debate in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] now and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] to close.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I have not said anything upon the pension legislation of this House, and what I say now will not impugn the motives of anybody in expressing his opinion, either in amendments proposed to the bill or what has been said in support of amendments. The situation growing out of the Civil War, where so much bitterness was inevitable, would cause one's motives probably to be impugned if his utterances were not entirely clear when he speaks on pension matters. All I rise to say is this, that the Civil War was the greatest contest that history knows anything about between two wings of the Anglo-Saxon people, taking two distinct views of our system of Federal Government, and when it closed the most remarkably dramatic and in many ways historical event that is known in the history of civil government took place. I want to repeat to this group of men that, in my judgment, the greatest single incident in the history of civil government in the world was the successful ending of that war for the preservation of this Union. There is no doubt in the mind of any man upon either side of this House as to that statement. It is now 49 years since that sublime scene at Appomattox took place, where the great general, the conquering hero, and leader of the forces of the Federal Army, received, in recognition of the splendid abilities of the peerless man from Virginia, the leader of the Confederate forces, not the sword, but rather the symbol of surrender. The scene was brightened when it was stated that we do not want to humiliate anybody in this country, especially a soldiery of the type of those laying down their arms. Therefore that tremendous conflict closed with less rancor between the two leaders, as well as between their followers, and I do not believe anything ought to be said upon the floor now, either on this side or on that, that would indicate that we want to revive any ill feeling between the two sides. [Applause.] All I am asking, 49 years after its close, with the average age of those who fought for the Nation's life beyond 70, when no great number can longer remain, is that we do not make any move in any way to reduce our appreciation of the men who fought in this struggle for the preservation of the Union. [Applause.]

Let us not make any change of policy at this late day. I say this not to impugn anybody's motive. I only ask Members not to run counter to their own judgment, but let the Sherwood bill stand unamended until we amend it by giving greater recognition. If such an amendment as that is proposed, I will support it. These amendments subtract. Do not take it away. [Applause.] I would not take any pension away from the man 70 years old, who leaves the United States to go into Canada, a newer country, to try to make a home there because, perhaps, there is an opportunity, or, at least, a better opportunity, up there that he has not had here beceuse of the incentives held out to settlers. I would not take it away from him. I would not take it away from the man who, because of his ability, is enabled to draw $100 a month, for I would not want to put our pension policy upon a pauper basis, but would want to put it on a service basis. And because he happens to be able to command a salary, I would not punish him by taking it away from him. I call upon the membership of this House in 1914, 50 years after the struggle has closed, not to start a movement to reduce our appreciation of the men who fought in this tremendous war for the Union. And that is not said in any derogation of the splendid abilities and soldierly qualities that are recognized in the men who fought on the other side of this great struggle.

I speak to my friends from the Southland and I speak to my friends from the Northland. Let us act now as if we have not forgotten the valiant services of the gallant men or lessened the appreciation that we owe to this citizenship. I hope that both of these amendments will be voted down and that we shall take no backward step in our treatment of the men who made possible the Nation as we behold it to-day, a half century later. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

[Mr. RUCKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] may have three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] may have three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have voted, I believe, consistently against giving old-age pensions to soldiers who have renounced their allegiance to the United States. I think I shall vote for the Borland amendment, because that takes care of every soldier who was disabled in the service. I can not understand how that will do any injustice to any soldier who served during the Civil War.

I have always opposed age pensions. I said on the floor of the House when my pension bill was pending that I was in favor of a pension for service and disability. That age pension provision was put on in the Senate as a compromise. I do not believe there is any merit in being old. In two Congresses I have been the oldest man in Congress, and if there is any merit in being old or any virtue in being old then I am the most virtuous man in this Congress. [Laughter and applause.] When my pension bill was finally enacted I said I would never accept a pension under the Sherwood bill, because it pensioned a man for age, or because he was old. I never have and never will apply for a pension under that law, because I believe in making the pension roll a roll of honor, for service or disability. [Applause.] I shall support this amendment, because I do not believe that a man who thinks this country is not good enough to live in, a man who repudiates that flag that hangs above our handsome Chairman, and who swears allegiance to a foreign country, has any business to take money out of the United States Treasury. I am in favor of taking all we can get for soldiers who still stand by the flag. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], and to that a substitute is offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. The question will first be taken on the substitute.

Mr. GORDON. Can we not have the substitute reported?

Mr. GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute and amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The substitute offered by Mr. BORLAND was again read.

The question being taken on the substitute, on a division (demanded by Mr. BORLAND) there were—ayes 28, noes 80.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the returns we have just had, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not withdraw the amendment except by unanimous consent.

Several Members objected.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RUCKER. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15280) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARTLETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to file a privileged report (H. Rept. 655) of the committee appointed under House resolution 256, to investigate and report whether any Member has been guilty of violating the provisions of the criminal code by soliciting contributions for political purposes, known as the Doremus investigation, and to announce that on some day next week I will call up the matter for consideration. I file also the views of the minority and ask that both reports be printed.

The SPEAKER. The report and the views of the minority will be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 11, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the spirit of patriotism which obtains in the hearts of our people, that to-day the tears of a Nation will mingle with the tears of those bereft of their dear ones, who died upholding the honor and dignity of the flag which we cherish as the emblem of all that we hold sacred. The Nation honors itself in honoring its precious dead, and while she thus cares for her defenders she will not want for patriots in peace or in war. Be with, we beseech Thee, the stricken and torn hearts in this hour of sorrow. May they look to a bright beyond, where the true, the brave, self-sacrificing find a glorious reward. Peace be to their ashes, and joy ineffable to their souls as they go marching on, and everlasting praise be Thine. In the name of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

"YOUR FLAG AND MY FLAG."

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, in response to several inquiries as to the authorship, and in order that credit may be given where credit is due, I wish to state that the poem "Your Flag and My Flag," repeated by me during remarks on the Mexican situation on April 20, was written by Wilbur D. Nesbit, a successful writer of Chicago. When Mr. Nesbit wrote the poem he was a member of the staff of the Baltimore American, and it is printed in a volume of his verse entitled "Trail to Boy Land." Several Members have recited the poem at different times, and without credit, I among the number. At the time I gave it I did not know the author. Knowing him now, I hasten to give this belated acknowledgment. [Applause.]

TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering the bill H. R. 12873.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ADAIR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12873) relating to the assessment for taxation of real estate in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that two weeks ago when the House adjourned a substitute had been offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], which has been read, and it is now open to debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have sent an amendment to the substitute to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] by striking out all of the substitute after the word "That," which first appears therein, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "There is hereby levied and imposed upon all taxable real estate in the District of Columbia an annual tax equal in rate to that which is now or which hereafter may be levied or imposed by Congress upon tangible personal property in the District of Columbia; and the same rate of taxation is hereby levied and imposed upon all intangible personal property in the District of Columbia which would be taxable under existing law were it tangible personal property, including moneys, credits, accounts, shares of stocks, bonds, annuities, and all other evidences of indebtedness. All laws which are now in force or which may hereafter be put in force in the District of Columbia governing or affecting the listing, return, or assessment of tangible personal property and the collection of tax thereon, and the penalties for failure relative to the listing, return, assessment, or collection of taxes relative thereto are hereby made applicable to intangible property. Hereafter all real estate in the District of Columbia shall be assessed annually at its real and true value. However, nothing herein shall be construed as to change the present manner of taxing banks, trust companies, lighting, heating, and street-railway companies, except that all real estate owned by any of said companies shall be assessed annually and taxed as of its real and true value. Neither shall anything herein be so construed as to levy or impose any tax upon shares of the capital stock of any corporation which pays to the District of Columbia the required tax upon all of the property represented by its capital stock, or which corporation pays taxes to the District of Columbia as provided by law upon its earnings or receipts. In addition to the real estate which is now exempted by law from taxation in the District of Columbia there shall also be exempted from taxation every parsonage and rectory owned by a religious congregation or organization while it is used by its pastor, preacher, minister, or rabbi as a residence; and, in addition thereto there shall be exempt from taxation in said District $500 of the value of each dwelling house occupied by the owner thereof as a residence; and, in lieu of the existing exemption as to personal property, there shall be exempt from taxation $500 worth of any kind of personal property (tangible or intangible) which any person may own. The word 'person' as used in the next preceding sentence shall not apply to any firm, copartnership, or corporation. All bonds issued either by the United States or by the District of Columbia are hereby exempted from the payment of tax to the District of Columbia. The assessment of real estate shall be commenced not later than the first Monday in November and concluded by the last day of February in each year. The words 'real estate' as herein used in addition to their ordinary meaning shall include any right of way over or right of occupancy of the land of another. The words 'real and true value' as herein used shall be construed to mean the fair cash value of the property, or the equivalent thereof, estimated at the price it would bring at a fair, voluntary sale without regard to conflicting claims of title. Personal property of every description shall be assessed as of the 1st day of July in each year. All real estate in the District of Columbia subject to taxation shall be assessed, and its taxable value and status determined as of the 1st day of January of each year for purposes of taxation for the fiscal year beginning the 1st day of July following. This act shall become effective on July 1 next after its final passage; and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent or in any wise in conflict herewith are hereby repealed to the extent to which they may be inconsistent or in conflict herewith."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have just offered strikes out everything in the substitute which was offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], except the first word thereof, and is intended to take the place of each and every paragraph in the substitute. The amendment is somewhat lengthy, and I believe it will be very well to have an explanation of it. I do not believe that that explanation can be made within the five minutes under which rule we are now operating. I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the original bill, as introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE], was amended in a great many respects by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which it was referred. The bill as amended was reported to the House and is upon the calendar.

It has been debated two days. At the close of general debate and after the first paragraph had been read, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] offered a substitute for the entire bill. The amendment which I have just offered strikes out everything of the substitute after the first word and inserts in lieu thereof the matter which has been read at the Clerk's desk.

This amendment to the substitute differs materially from the original bill, and it also differs very materially from the substitute. In the original bill and in the substitute, after considerable study was given to it, it was ascertained that both the original bill and the substitute would have changed the manner of taxing banks, trust companies, street car companies, and so forth. The amendment to the substitute which I have just offered makes no change from the present plan of taxing these institutions. It leaves them taxed just as they are now taxed, with one single exception, that whatever real estate subject to taxation these institutions now own would be subject to taxation under full value instead of the two-thirds value as now.

Under the original George bill, with the amendments put on the bill by the committee, and under the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], these properties would be taxed according to their ad valorem value, whereas they are now taxed on the basis of their gross receipts. The amendment leaves them taxed on their gross receipts, not on the ad valorem basis, as contemplated by the George bill, and also by the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Do I understand that the utility companies are taxed on their gross receipts, and in addition thereto are also taxed upon their real estate, and that the tax upon the real estate is not deducted or taken into consideration in the taxation of the companies upon their gross receipts?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Michigan understands the situation correctly. The amendment that I have offered leaves that unchanged.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there also a tax upon their valuation, and in addition to that a tax upon the gross receipts?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As I stated a moment ago, the amendment I have offered does not change the present system in any respect, except where they now pay a tax on real estate at two-thirds of its value, it compels them to pay a tax, like other people, on the full value of the real estate.

Mr. PAYNE. I am not familiar with what the rule is now. What I want to get is, I understand the gentleman's amendment taxes them on the full value of the real estate and on the gross receipts. Is there any valuation put on the property itself, on the capital?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; the tax they pay is on the real estate and on their gross receipts. The amendment I have offered leaves them taxed upon their real estate and upon their gross receipts, just as now, except as said above.

Mr. PAYNE. It does not seem to me that the rule now, or the rule proposed by the gentleman, provides a uniform rule for assessment and taxation on the property of public utilities.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is uniform, perhaps, from this standpoint, that the tax upon their gross receipts is in the nature of a franchise tax. An individual, having no franchise, would have no franchise tax to pay.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COPLEY. What about the personal property of these utility companies?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is taxed.

Mr. COPLEY. At the present time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is taxed at the present time under that clause of the law which compels them to pay taxes upon their gross receipts.

Mr. COPLEY. Then the tax on the gross receipts at present covers——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Everything except their real estate.

Mr. COPLEY. And the gentleman's proposed amendment provides that they shall pay a tax on 100 per cent of the value of their real estate and shall pay a percentage of their gross receipts, and also that they shall pay a tax on their personal property?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Not in addition to their gross receipts.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman explain how his amendment differs from the Prouty amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What is known as the Prouty amendment would tax the public utilities and the banks, the trust companies, just as individuals are taxed. It would tax them upon all their real estate. It would tax them upon all their personal property, both tangible and intangible, and would by implication repeal the law which now taxes them upon their gross receipts. The amendment which I have just offered leaves them taxed as they are now taxed, with the single exception that it adds one-third more to whatever real estate they may own.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. FESS. As I understand, the gross-receipts tax is the same as the franchise tax?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gross-receipts tax is supposed to cover their personal property and also to include a franchise tax.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the rule now in relation to banking institutions?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A bank pays 4 per cent on savings and 6 per cent on national bank business.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is the purpose by this amendment to take care of all the provisions for the taxation of real estate in the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is what I announced when I first rose.

Mr. IGOE. Then the gentleman proposes to leave the present assessment system the same as it is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; this amendment makes an annual assessment, and makes it upon full value.

Mr. IGOE. Does that increase the force of the assessor's office?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It does not, and I am informed by the gentleman from Iowa, Judge PROUTY, that he has information from the assessor's office that they do not need an increase.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman please state whether the taxation of banks is a certain per cent upon their capital stock?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is on their gross earnings.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. It is quite different from some other cities. And their real estate is taken out of the gross earnings?

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. CROSSER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the amendment which I offered changes the law in regard to the taxation of public utilities?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. I would like to have the gentleman point out wherein it does. It was not my intention to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think the gentleman can find anything in his substitute which leaves the banks and trust companies and the public utilities to be taxed as they are; but, if his substitute should prevail, then they would be taxed under the general plan. In other words, they might escape a franchise tax altogether.

Mr. CROSSER. Will the gentleman permit me to read from my substitute what I think covers the situation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. CROSSER. I read from page 2, lines 8 to 12:

The tax rate hereafter levied upon tangible personal property now assessable shall be the same as that fixed by the said commissioners to be levied upon real estate as herein provided.

I do not think there is another reference made to any other kind of property.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the trouble with it.

Mr. CROSSER. We would not be repealing it——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; we would be, by implication, and an irresistible implication at that. That would impose a tax on the personal property of the utilities companies and of the financial institutions, and if that were the system of direct taxation for them it might repeal the franchise tax altogether.

Mr. PAYNE. Suppose a man owned shares of stock in a public utility company here in the city of Washington and he resides here and pays taxes here. Are the shares which he owns taxed at their full value as intangible property?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from New York has anticipated me a little bit, as I have not yet come to that, but I will answer him and say that according to the substitute I have offered, where the public-utility company itself pays the tax the shares of stock in the hands of those who own it do not pay a tax.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that confined simply to public utilities here in the city of Washington? Suppose a man owns stock in public utilities in my town, for instance, where they pay the tax there, is the stockholder also obliged to pay here upon the full value of those shares?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This bill is dealing only with property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. COADY. Oh, if the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman from New York is right. That is the effect of the Johnson-Prouty amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not disagree with the gentleman [Mr. PAYNE], for he is correct in that assumption; but the answer still is true, that under this bill we are dealing only with property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PAYNE. I know; but a resident of the District of Columbia may own shares in public utilities in one of the States. Does he pay on that as intangible property?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under this bill he would have to pay.

Mr. COADY. At full city rates.

Mr. PAYNE. Notwithstanding the fact these public utilities paid like taxes in their own locality? It would be double taxation on the property. Suppose I was a resident here, which I hope I never will be, and suppose I own some stock in the public utilities in my own town, which I do not, now I could be assessed for the full value of these shares here, while the public utilities in my own town paid their full taxes upon their full value there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. PAYNE. In other words, so far as that property is concerned, it would have double taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is correct in his understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have more time, if he desires it. How much more time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Fifteen minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky may be extended for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COADY. Referring to the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] regarding the taxation of securities held by residents of the District but issued in another State, has not the commission appointed by the governor of the gentleman's State recommended that these securities be taxed about 30 cents on the 100?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe what the gentleman says is correct, and I will say that the legislature refused to pass it at the last session, which adjourned only a few weeks ago.

Mr. COADY. Is it not also true that the commission reported that there were 200,000 acres of land in the gentleman's State not on the tax books?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know whether it does or not, but I would like to see that none of it escapes taxation; but I am no more responsible for the condition that exists there than the gentleman himself. If I were there in the legislative body, I would endeavor to correct whatever defects there might be in the tax laws of the State.

Mr. COADY. The only reason I asked the gentleman from Kentucky the question was the fact that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] laid so much stress on the fact that the people of those States are allowed to bear the burdens of the District of Columbia, and I want to show by your own report and from the report of the Iowa commission——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Can not the gentleman make his speech in his own time?

Mr. COADY. I will just finish in a moment—that the property in his own State is only assessed about 52 per cent of its true value, and in the State of Kentucky they receive more from the tax on dogs than from the tax on securities, according to their own report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is the common practice, Mr. Chairman, in the House for some gentleman who is opposed to a proposition, no matter how right it may be in the opinion of other people, to state the defects of his own State as an argument why nothing should be done here. As I have just said, if I were a member of the Kentucky legislative body I should exert myself most actively in the correction of whatever wrongs there may exist in the tax system. As I am not there, but am here, as a member of the committee that deals with the affairs of the District of Columbia I am endeavoring to right some wrongs which exist here, regardless of the fact entirely whether or not those wrongs exist elsewhere; and it is no argument with me, and should not be with the House, that because my native State has not a perfect taxing system that the District of Columbia should not have one.

But in further explanation of the substitute, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say this, that under the amendment which I have offered to the substitute the owner of a home, or, to put it in other words, the householder, is exempt under my amendment from $500 of its value if he lives in it. In addition $500 worth of tangible personal property is exempt for everybody. In addition, still, $500 worth of intangible personal property is exempt for everybody. In other words, the small householder is protected to the extent of having an exemption from taxation of $500 in the value of that house. In addition to that, all other people have an exemption from taxation to the extent of $500 of tangible property, and then, to meet the argument which has been made here that the man who has his small savings deposited in a savings bank should have some exemption from taxation, he, too, in the amendment which I have offered, has been given an exemption to the extent of $500, the same as other people have been given. I am informed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] that he has information directly from the assessor's office, given him since this bill was amended in any wise, to the effect that all provisions made here for the assessment of property were entirely too much.

Those are the main differences between this amendment and all that goes before it, so that if it is adopted real estate will be assessed, or should be assessed, at its full value. The dollar and a half rate would obtain to the real estate and tangible and intangible personal property alike. The financial institutions and public utilities would be left taxed just as they are now, with a single exception that I have twice stated before—they would pay one-third more, or, rather, their real estate would be assessed at three-thirds instead of at two-thirds, as now. I have fully explained the difference between the amendment that I have offered and that which is now before the committee.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is the rate now 15 cents—the present rate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The present rate on real estate is two-thirds of the $1.50 a hundred.

Mr. OGLESBY. The gentleman means the assessment is supposed to be two-thirds of its value?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is supposed to be, but, as a matter of fact, it is not, but——

Mr. OGLESBY. The rate is fixed arbitrarily at 15 cents?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. By Congress; yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged a few more minutes. There has grown into all this discussion, and you can not keep it out, the question as to whether or not real estate in the District of Columbia is properly assessed and taxed.

I have before me a clipping from the Evening Star of last Friday, May 8. In that I notice this language:

> The first proposition has as its foundation the H. J. Browne guess of 1912 that there were $744,000,000 of taxable realty values in Washington in that year, estimated on the full valuation basis as "full valuation" is understood throughout the United States in the assessments of its cities.

I also find further in that newspaper clipping:

> The George taxation report of 1912 alleges that "real property in the District of Columbia is assessed $414,000,000 below its true value, the true value being $744,000,000, while the assessment is only $330,000,000."

Two years ago the District Committee made a report in what is known as the George report, and in that report it is stated that the real, true value of the real estate in the District of Columbia is $744,000,000. Upon that statement the local newspapers have thrown a fit every time it is mentioned, and the statement that real estate is undervalued for assessment purposes $414,000,000 has been hooted at as being a most ridiculous and preposterous one.

I happen to have in my hand a little pamphlet or brochure entitled "Story of the Heights." It deals with Massachusetts Avenue Heights, and on page 23 of that statement, issued by the Thomas J. Fisher Real Estate Co., is this wonderful statement:

> Real estate—the basis of all solid wealth—offers a wonderful profit in Washington. It never can shrink in value unless the Nation shrinks. It is not like stocks and bonds and other securities. In 1903, according to Moody's Magazine, the stocks of this country dropped $3,000,000,000; in 1907 they shrank $7,000,000,000; in 1910 (last year) they went off $950,000,000.

Now, will you please listen to this statement:

> During the past 30 years, according to the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, the value of Washington real estate never halted, but increased from $200,000,000 to $1,210,000,000.

We must take it for granted that every statement made in this pamphlet is true. It is issued by the Thomas J. Fisher Real Estate Co., as I have said, and its president but little more than a year ago was one of those who brought to the attention of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the assertion that a local insurance company was issuing literature to the public which was not exactly accurate in every particular. I therefore take it for granted that the president of this institution, who raised that question with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and caused an exhaustive examination to be made, is not going to permit to go out from his company a statement like that unless it be literally true.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. FESS. Not to a question pertaining to that, but I want to get at your bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will come to it directly, if you will indulge me just a moment.

Mr. FESS. I am afraid the time will be up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This pamphlet, or brochure, which I have, Mr. Chairman, is quite an interesting document. On page 6 is a picture not of the residence or of the house but of the "mansion" of Senator George S. Nixon, of Nevada. Upon the other side, on page 7, we have the picture of the mansion of United States Senator Francis G. Newlands, of Nevada, adjoining these heights. Upon the next page we have the mansion of Mr. Charles C. Glover, president of the Riggs National Bank. On the next page we have a picture of the handsome mansion of "Mr. John R. McLean, of Cincinnati." Over on page 11 we have the picture of the extensive grounds and the mansion of Charles J. Bell, president of the American Security & Trust Co. Then on page 12 we find this language:

> On the north side of Massachusetts Avenue and adjoining the heights on the northwest are the grounds of the Protestant Episcopal schools.

That is offered as an inducement for people to buy property out there, no doubt, but they fail to say that there never has been a student in that institution and there is not now.

Then, I find on page 13 of this very interesting little document this language:

> Sheridan Circle—

That is the place out here on Massachusetts Avenue where they have a statue of Gen. Sheridan on a horse that looks as if he were dying with a sudden attack of the botts—

> Sheridan Circle is the social center of Washington and Washington is the social center of the Nation. The truth of both statements is well known. Scores of successful Americans, whose individual fortunes range from ten to one hundred millions of dollars, within the last five years have built mansions along Massachusetts Avenue and around its newest and most attractive circle. And they still are coming; the flow hardly has begun.
> In its issue of January 29, 1911, the New York Times in a Washington dispatch headed, "Is Washington cornering our multimillionaires? Remarkable growth of a colony whose wealthy recruits come from all parts of the country to the Nation's Capital," said:
> "The pioneers of the millionaire colony here were the late Thomas F Walsh, John R. McLean, the Leiters, and Mrs. A. C. Barney. In the building up of Sheridan Circle as the real social center of Washington much is due to Mrs. Barney, who built her beautiful studio house there—an art marvel. Now the entire circle is marked by an imposing row of marble mansions. Around Sheridan Circle the bonanza kings have spread their palace tents—the Hennen Jenningses, the Norman Williamses, and others."

The panoramic view given in this booklet shows Sheridan Circle in its rare residential beauty with the heights close by, toward which homes of equal magnificence are building. Soon the block or two of intervening space will fill with contemplated mansions for which most of it already has been bought at prices five times greater than will be asked at the start for more elevated and better sites on the heights. There the kings of wealth soon must raise their modern palaces and proceed along the royal avenue of their desire. Owing to this pressure for sites to the northwest the District of Columbia Commissioners on January 25, 1911, commenced the necessary condemnation proceedings to open Massachusetts Avenue its full width to the District line, more than 2 miles beyond Massachusetts Avenue Heights.

Coming to page 19, Mr. Chairman, I find this:

Many great fortunes have been made in the rise of its real estate by its citizens and a few outside investors familiar with its marvelous jumps in value due to the city's steady acquisition of the country's men of colossal fortunes and the very limited area available for their magnificent and rival homes.

The fortunes of the people who already have sought rest in a life of elegance and ease in the city by the Potomac are conservatively estimated at one thousand millions of dollars. And more came last year than ever before.

* * * * * * *

From "The Hub" have come the Larz Andersons, the Weekes, and others. Among the New Yorkers are the John Hays Hammonds, the Perry Belmonts, the Robert Roosevelts, the Duryeas, the George W. Vanderbilts, and the Oliver Cromwells; from Chicago have come the Leiters, the Pullmans, the Munns, Mrs. Robert Hitt, Mrs. Potter Palmer, and Mrs. Marshall Field; from Cleveland the William J. Boardmans; from Pittsburgh, George F. Westinghouse; from Colorado the Thomas F. Walshes; from Pennsylvania the Scott Townsends; from West Virginia the Stephen B. Elkinses, and dozens of others to swell the host of multimillionaires who for the most part have built their Aladdinlike homes along Massachusetts Avenue.

Another type of Washington millionaire constantly increasing in number is the Representative and senatorial millionaire who after a term in Washington rarely leaves it. They, too, have magnificent homes and are lavish entertainers. Of this type are Senator DU PONT, of Delaware; Senators Nixon and NEWLANDS, of Nevada; and almost the whole roll call of the upper House. The Senator ranks next to the Cabinet officer and often is socially more important. Cabinet officers, judges, higher Government officials, and members of the diplomatic corps are also home builders in Washington, Franklin MacVeagh, Secretary of the Treasury, being the most recent addition to this class, having just completed his palatial residence.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman if that is an advertising circular of some real-estate boomer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is an advertising circular of a real-estate corporation whose president rose in your midst a little over a year ago and said nothing else than that no advertising schemes shall go forth from the city of Washington unless they are absolutely true.

Mr. PAYNE. And the gentleman brings that in as evidence of the value of an official report here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I bring in here a statement from a paper published in Baltimore, which I think is an authority upon the subject, which says that in the last 30 years the values of real estate in Washington have increased from $200,000,000 to $1,200,000,000. We have that statement here, where the findings of a committee, to the effect that the real-estate values of Washington amount only to $744,000,000, are impugned and attacked because it happens to be about $400,000,000 more than the assessment list shows.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a map issued by this same real-estate company showing the Massachusetts Heights section and the prices attached. The assessment here shows that those properties are assessed for one-fourth and one-sixth, even, of what is asked for this land that is shown upon this map.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Does the gentleman conclude or believe that the value of real estate has increased in proportion to a larger or greater extent than the value of personal property, from the reading of the names from the pamphlet he has just read?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Intangible property here is not taxed at all. I have no way of knowing what it is; neither has anybody else.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. But the names are given.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The names are given, and the statement that is made, that the wealth of these people varies from $10,000,000 to $100,000,000 each, carries with it, I think, the irresistible conclusion that their intangible property is not taxed.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Could not every one of them avoid payment of the personal tax here by claiming residence in New York or elsewhere?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is not a question for us to determine. One of the parties mentioned in this paper said, in a speech down here not long ago, that every Member of Congress was so ignorant that he did not know the difference between a cantilever and a pons asinorum. That may be true. But there is one thing I believe they do know. They do know a "jackassinorum" every time they hear him bray, even though he be a millionaire.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes left me I want to discuss one other proposition, and that is the taxing of intangible property, or, in other words, securities.

Whenever we have "a hearing" relative to the schoolteachers no man there has ever heard the masculine gender mentioned in that committee room. Everybody who appears before the committee on the part of the schools speaks of the "poor school marm," the female teachers of the schools. You would never suspect that there is a man in the whole school system. Just as soon as this bill or any other bill of a similar character comes before the House for consideration, then you begin to hear of "the poor widow."

Let me invite your attention to the very anomalous situation that is now staring us in the face. Here are Members of the House, here are members of the District Committee, who take this peculiar and, to me, inexplicable position that all intangible property should escape taxation because, perchance, some poor widow might be overtaxed or because somebody with his or her little savings in a savings bank would, under the original bill, be taxed. Bear in mind I have already fixed an exemption to the extent of $500 in favor of this class. But only a few days ago there came before the committee a man by the name of George Horning, who is the "king bee" of all the loan sharks in the District of Columbia, who stated before that committee that he had $250,000 loaned out to small borrowers at 36 per cent a year. There were men—and they will appear in a little while upon the floor of this House—urging an increase in the rate of interest for that man, and to-day they are here asking that that man who has $250,000 loaned out at a rate of interest which brings him in return an annual compensation for his money greater than the President's salary ought at least to pay some taxation upon the collateral which he holds. I say, in my opinion, that position is indefensible. To ask in one breath that this man's already extortionate rate of interest may be increased and to demand in the next that he shall escape taxation entirely upon that $250,000 is too much for my conscience.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask whether your plan is to make the valuation 100 per cent on real estate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is.

Mr. FESS. And then do you fix the rate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The rate is left as it is fixed now by law, $1.50 a hundred.

Mr. FESS. And you fix that arbitrarily?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And does the Government pay any tax upon the property it owns here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It does not, and I do not know of any place where it does. The gentleman is glad to have in his town, as I am to have in mine, a Government building, and to have it there without taxation.

Mr. FESS. And what provision, if any, is there in your bill for the Government to give any support to the District of Columbia?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no provision in my bill to give any support, for the very good reason that my proposition has nothing in it which takes away from the Federal Government the support that it is now giving.

Mr. FESS. Does it not in reality repeal the organic law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has gotten that from the local press. It does not repeal it in anywise, and it does not deal with it, or touch it in the remotest way. My amendment seeks simply to tax property which now escapes taxation.

Mr. FESS. That is why I am asking you. I want to know the facts about this.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I insist, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] has insisted well and ably, that the people in the District of Columbia ought to pay a reasonable rate of taxation. They are now paying less than is paid in cities of like size in all this country. I insist, as the gentleman from Iowa has insisted, that property here should bear a reasonable rate of taxation. I would rather see it too small than to see it too large. Then, when they have gathered in their receipts from that taxation, let the amount be what it will, whatever they fall short of actual needs the Federal Government ought to supplement to that extent.

Mr. FESS. And if it does not fall short at all the Federal Government will be released. Is that the idea?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is a matter to be dealt with in the future. This proposition stands upon the one bottom, that these people here ought to pay a reasonable rate of taxation upon their property, regardless of what the consequences may be, regardless of whether it requires the Federal Government to pay or not to pay.

Mr. FESS. Another question: Did you make any different arrangement as to the political status of the citizen of this District, or did you leave him under the present law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is a matter relating wholly and entirely to taxation. I have said here numerous times, and I repeat it, that I would like to see the shackles of bondage struck from every man in the District of Columbia and see him given the full right of citizenship that every other American has and ought to have.

Mr. FESS. That is where we differ.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have said repeatedly that I wish to see these people here have their own officials, elected by themselves, raise their own money, and spend it just as they see fit to spend it. I do not wish to see them asking for bread and be given a stone, as the result would be if they were simply given a Delegate in this House. I want them to have real, true, and genuine representation. I want to see them given the vote, just as you and I have it in our respective States. I will never be satisfied with the situation here until they have been set free. No matter what any man says to the contrary, they have been sold into bondage simply in order that the Federal Treasury may be looted for the benefit of "the few" and not for the masses of the people in the District of Columbia.

Let us see whether or not real estate in the District of Columbia is overtaxed or whether, as I have said, it is undertaxed.

I have here a list of 40 cities in the United States. Opposite the name of each city I will put its rate of taxation, beginning with the city which has the smallest rate, and go on down the list, naming the cities in order as the rate of taxation increases, as follows:

Washington, on the $100	$1.00
Philadelphia, on the $100	1.50
St. Louis, on the $100	1.51
Pittsburgh, on the $100	1.53
Cincinnati, on the $100	1.56
Bridgeport, on the $100	1.65
Chicago, on the $100	1.71
Boston, on the $100	1.72
New Orleans, on the $100	1.72
Milwaukee, on the $100	1.76
St. Paul, on the $100	1.76
Minneapolis, on the $100	1.79
Lawrence, on the $100	1.80
New York, on the $100	1.82
Springfield, on the $100	1.82
Brooklyn, on the $100	1.85
Cleveland, on the $100	1.88
New Haven, on the $100	1.90
Rochester, on the $100	1.93
Lowell, on the $100	1.94
Lincoln, Nebr., on the $100	1.97
Baltimore, on the $100	1.98
Detroit, on the $100	1.99
Camden, on the $100	2.00
Syracuse, on the $100	2.00
Trenton, on the $100	2.00
Lynn, Mass., on the $100	2.00
New Bedford, on the $100	2.02
Newark, on the $100	2.02
Fall River, on the $100	2.03
Cambridge, on the $100	2.04
Providence, on the $100	2.05
Jersey City, on the $100	2.12
Grand Rapids, on the $100	2.14
Tacoma, on the $100	2.17
Utica, on the $100	2.20
Des Moines, on the $100	2.22
Buffalo, on the $100	2.29
Charleston, S. C., on the $100	2.50

And yet, after a showing of that kind, which places Washington as the least taxed of them all, there come those here to-day and defend Washington's millionaires from paying tax on their wealth.

The general average paid by the 40 cities which I have just named is $1.90 on each $100 worth of property, yet Washington complains of being overtaxed, when she pays only a dollar on the hundred.

It costs to run the whole government of the State of Kentucky only about seven and a half millions of dollars. It costs nearly twice that much money to run the government of the District of Columbia, which is no larger than the smallest county in Kentucky. Yet the people of the District of Columbia want more money. However, they object to paying a reasonable rate of taxation. They want the people of Kentucky additionally taxed and the money sent here.

Mr. Chairman, let me express the hope that my amendment will be adopted, and, in consequence, the millions and millions which now go untaxed in this city may pay a just proportion of the burden of government.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] offers an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER]. This very amendment that he offers now demonstrates very clearly to me, and I think to the House, that the majority of the Committee on the District of Columbia acted wisely in submitting the substitute which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] presented here to the House.

This bill grew out of an investigation made in the last Congress by a special committee of this House, and in a report that was submitted to this House, signed first of all by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], these recommendations were made:

First, annual in place of triennial assessments.

That provision is incorporated in the Johnson-Prouty bill, it is incorporated in the Crosser substitute, and it is incorporated in the amendment now submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The next proposition—and it is the one upon which we differ in the committee—is this: The repeal of the fixed assessment rate of 1½ per cent, leaving the rate to be fixed annually by the requirements of the budget. That proposition is not incorporated in the Johnson-Prouty bill, but it is incorporated in the Crosser substitute, and it is not incorporated in the amendment now submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The next proposition is the requiring of the true consideration in all real-estate transfers. That provision has been met by a bill which recently passed this House.

The fourth proposition is the substitution of 12 field assessors for 3 assistant assessors now on the field work. That proposition is taken care of in the Johnson-Prouty bill. It is taken care of in the Crosser substitute; but it is absolutely ignored in the amendment which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] now offers upon the floor of this House. He says that the assessor now proclaims that he has enough help. But, Mr. Chairman, in the report of the committee headed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is the statement that the assessor, the man who is now the assessor, insisted that he must have at least 10 men to do the work. The committee has provided 12 men.

The fifth proposition is the abolition of the requirement for the assessors in the field personally and jointly to view each piece of property. That provision, so far as I can find, is not in the substitute now offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. It is in the Johnson-Prouty bill and it is in the Crosser substitute.

The next proposition is a very important one, that power be restored to the commissioners to remove the assessor or any of the assistant assessors for cause. In the investigation made by that committee in the last Congress, and in investigations made by the committee in this Congress, the crying evil was that the assessor and the assistant assessor could not be removed except with charges preferred, I believe, and sustained in the courts; and while one of the assessors was removed for cause by the commissioners, that case is now pending in the courts. And yet there is nothing, so far as I can see, in this amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] which meets that proposition; but it is taken care of in the Johnson-Prouty bill and in the Crosser substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Crosser substitute. I believe that is the bill we ought to pass. There is no difference between the members of the committee upon the general propositions involved, but the difference and the dispute came in section 2 of the Johnson-Prouty bill, which is the majority bill. The minority of the committee believe that the tax rate should not be fixed at any particular definite rate, but that it should be fixed by the commissioners according to the needs of the District. The majority undertook to fix a rate of 1½ per cent, no matter what sum may be raised, no matter what may be the needs of the District.

Further than that, the minority of the committee believes that this bill was intended originally to provide an effective system for the assessment of real estate. That was the purpose of the bill, and that was the purpose of the committee in drafting the bill in the first instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Has your committee considered the advisability of assessing real estate and tangible personal property and intangible personal property credits by a different plan?

Mr. IGOE. I was coming to that proposition, if the gentleman will pardon me. I will say that I am in favor of the taxation of personal property, but I am undecided how far we should go. Originally I thought we could tax it all and tax it at the same rate, but on thinking it over further and getting into the subject, I found that the further I got into it the less I knew about it. I realize that there has been no investigation made by any committee of the House on the subject of the taxation of personal property in the District of Columbia.

While I am on it, let me call attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky and say that if I had my choice between the original Johnson-Prouty bill and this amendment I would choose the original bill because, in my judgment, this is a makeshift. It does not meet or correct the evils that we want to meet and correct.

Now, the gentleman says that the Crosser substitute would leave the banks and trust companies and utility companies free of taxation. That I deny. The only provision relating to personal-property taxation in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] is this:

> The tax rate hereafter levied upon tangible personal property, now assessable, shall be the same as that fixed by the said commissioners to be levied upon real estate as herein provided.

Under the present law national banks, incorporated banks, trust companies, gas companies, electric lighting and telephone companies, on gross earnings and their real estate, pay as follows: Banks and trust companies, 6 per cent; gas companies, 5 per cent; electric lighting and telephone companies, 4 per cent; street railway companies, 4 per cent; insurance companies, 1½ per cent; building associations, 2 per cent; the Washington Market Co., 4 per cent on its gross earnings.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky where, in his amendment, he takes care of the tax paid by insurance companies? In his amendment he says "nothing herein shall be deemed to change the present methods of taxing banks, lighting companies, street railway companies," and there he ends. We have a provision in the law for the taxing of title and real-estate bonding companies and savings banks having no capital, 1½ per cent on surplus and undivided profits; Washington Market Co., 4 per cent on gross earnings. Perhaps the gentleman would like to grant an exemption to some of these companies so that they will not be overburdened. We know, however, that he does not want to do that. The whole trouble is, gentlemen, the subject of personal-property taxation and taxation of the gross receipts of the different companies has not been gone into, and there is no man on the floor of this House who has information enough to enable him to go into the matter fully at this time and bring in a bill that is fair, just, and equitable.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman know about the accuracy of the valuation of the District real estate put in the Prouty report at $744,000,000?

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman from Iowa took the figures from the report of the committee appointed by the last Congress. From all the information I have I think the information is correct. I take them to be correct. The investigation was made very carefully, and they had to go on the testimony of experts who were residents of the District of Columbia. I assume that that item is correct. That, however, does not include the Government property nor the District property. I think the total is something like $1,200,000,000.

Mr. COOPER. My attention has been called to the fact that St. Louis, with a population of 750,000, is larger in area than the entire District of Columbia, and has products and manufactures valued at $468,000,000——

Mr. IGOE. Yes; we have a great city.

Mr. COOPER. Washington has a population of about 330,000. Now, there is very little, if any, manufacturing in Washington, and yet the real estate in St. Louis is valued on a 60 per cent basis at $441,854,000, only $111,000,000 more than the District on a 60 per cent basis. How is it that in St. Louis, with 750,000 population and with all of these manufactures, real estate is valued at $441,000,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COOPER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. I will say to the gentleman that I have no first-hand information as to the District of Columbia and have had nothing to do with the assessment of property in St. Louis.

Mr. COOPER. The same facts are essentially true, according to statements I have seen, of the cities of Baltimore, Detroit, and Minneapolis, much larger cities than the city of Washington.

Mr. IGOE. I do not know anything about the real-estate values in the different cities. It is true about Washington that the public buildings here and the magnificent structures that have been erected greatly increase the value of property. Of course the purpose of this bill—that is, of the Crosser substitute, which I believe should be adopted—is to get the real, true assessment of real estate, whether it is a billion or a hundred million.

Mr. COOPER. Is it the gentleman's idea that great factories, bringing great revenue to their owners, as they do in Detroit, would be less valuable than property held for residential purposes?

Mr. IGOE. I will say to the gentleman that I am not a real-estate expert, and do not know very much about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the location of factories in the midst of a good residential district would depreciate the value of the real estate rather than to enhance its value?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is it not a fact that real estate owned by manufacturing companies is exempt from taxation?

Mr. IGOE. They are not in my city; I do not know what they are in others.

Mr. COOPER. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, it is proper to say that great manufacturing plants are not situated in residential districts; manufactories are usually by themselves.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and the truth of it is I have no doubt the residential portion of a town will move away from a factory just as fast as the factory is located.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; but the sum total of the value of the real estate would include the value of these vast manufacturing plants, together with the residences of the employers and those of the employees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that if there were more of these millionaires of whom I have just read, locating and building these great mansions and big estates, real estate would increase in value very much faster than if it were a manufacturing city.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of time taken up in the discussion of this bill, and about 90 per cent of it relates to things not embodied in the bill and with which it has nothing to do. What we want to put upon the books is a law that will provide a just and equitable assessment system. In order to be fair and just and equitable to all of the real-estate owners here we must have an efficient system. The Crosser substitute follows the recommendations of the committee appointed by this House in the last Congress, signed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], whose name leads all the rest, and it seems to me that this bill which the gentleman from Ohio offers as a substitute should be adopted.

A great deal has been said about the half-and-half plan, about how much money will be raised under the Johnson-Prouty amendment and under the Crosser amendment. I wish to say to the gentlemen of this House that I do not believe this is the bill upon which we should legislate in regard to abolishing the half-and-half plan or modifying it. This assessment system which is provided and the system for fixing the tax rate leaves that matter as it is to-day. The Appropriations Committee of this House passes upon the needs of the District, and that committee will determine how much the Government will contribute. That committee has the power now, through appropriation bills, to refuse to appropriate the one-half which the Government has been in the habit of giving to the District, but when the appropriation estimates come in, if the committee decides that the District must pay $7,000,000, then, under the bill offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], the commissioners can fix that amount and raise that amount of money.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. This substitute is looking to a modification of that relationship, is it not?

Mr. IGOE. The substitute does not touch upon that at all, but it does provide a system whereby if Congress subsequently repeals the half-and-half system and says the Government will pay one-fourth or one-tenth, or nothing, this system will be effective at that time, just as much so as it would under the half-and-half plan.

Mr. FESS. Would the Government probably repeal the half-and-half plan unless this substitute makes it unnecessary to continue?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I do not know. Personally, I do not believe in the half-and-half plan, but I have not been able to hit upon a substitute for it yet. I voted for a bill to repeal the half-and-half plan.

Mr. FESS. What I am interested in is this: Before we make any radical change, where we have not definite knowledge, it seems to me we ought to have a little further investigation than we have had.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman is speaking now of repealing the half-and-half plan?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Under the Crosser substitute, if the half-and-half plan operates, the commissioners will fix the rate to raise the amount of money that Congress says the District must raise. If Congress says the District must raise it all, then you have a bill under which it all may be raised, if the District has to do it. Something has been said about the commissioners having too much power.

Mr. FESS. Is this bill intended to reach the place where Congress could say the District can not have this money?

Mr. IGOE. The Crosser bill simply provides as perfect a system of assessment and taxation as we can devise, and that is the main purpose of it.

Mr. FESS. Without taking into consideration what the Government ought to do?

Mr. IGOE. Without taking into consideration what the Government ought to do; but no matter what the Government does, the money can be raised under the Crosser substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Also without taking into consideration at all the question of intangible personal property.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky and to the Members of this House that it took probably two years to investigate the question of real-estate assessments in the District, and the Johnson-Prouty amendment was supposed to solve it all; and now comes another amendment to take its place, supposedly even more perfect than it, and yet it is full of holes. There has not been sufficient consideration given to the question of personal-property assessment to incorporate it in this bill, and it should not be incorporated.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. METZ. I do not know the system of raising money, whether you appropriate before you raise and spend or raise first and then spend?

Mr. IGOE. Under the present system the rate is fixed now.

Mr. METZ. Fixed upon the basis of appropriations, what you are going to spend?

Mr. IGOE. No; at the present time the rate is $1.50, and it is assessed on two-thirds of the value of the real estate.

Mr. METZ. And the gentleman wants to get it to 100 per cent?

Mr. IGOE. Yes; but we want to repeal the 1½ provision, so that the commissioners can fix the rate to meet the needs of the District.

Mr. METZ. The point I am getting at is this: Take the intangible property. The personal-property tax is a farce throughout the country wherever it is in force.

Mr. IGOE. I will say to the gentleman that in the substitute which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] offers we leave personal-property taxation just as it is now, to be taken care of otherwise at some future time.

Mr. METZ. But I say the personal-property tax is a farce. Personal property is assessed in the city of New York. We make up a budget of our requirements for the year, and then we have an assessment, including personal property, for taxation, exempting, of course, the city property, the Federal property, and the charitable institutions and churches, as is done here; but whenever the assessment on personal property is fixed, it is usually fixed from the blue book, according to the kind of a street a man lives on.

My coachman may be assessed for $10,000, and he is tickled to death to think that he has so much credit. He does not pay two cents, and he does not swear off the assessment, so it remains an asset to the city, even though it is uncollectible. The city of New York at one time had $14,000,000 absolutely uncollectible personal taxes. They spend the money and then can not collect it. You do the same thing here, and how are you going to get back the money which you do not collect on the personal assessments? Where does it come from?

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman asked a question which was so long I believe I can not answer it.

Mr. METZ. Does not the gentleman think that would be the effect here?

Mr. IGOE. I hope the Crosser substitute will be adopted, and that we may have an efficient and full assessment in the city of Washington.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman, four weeks ago, District day, I discussed this bill and at some length this Johnson-Prouty amendment, and there is very little now I can add to what I said at that time without repeating myself. However, the distinguished chairman of the committee this morning, in referring to some objections to that amendment made by myself and others some time ago, said that some of the cases that were cited were extreme cases, notably the case of a young man or young woman who by dint of hard work and economy saved a few dollars and put them in a savings bank. I said then that those people would be compelled to yield up to the District Government one-half of the savings they derive from the investment of their funds. The gentleman says that is an extreme case. Two weeks ago when we were discussing this question I was called out into the lobby and another of these extreme cases was pointed out to me. I was told a few days ago there was a man in the Government employ, a hard-working, industrious, and economical man, who had saved $10,000. He was a widower with one young boy. He died, and before his death he made a will, directing that this money be deposited in a savings bank in the city of Washington and the income from this $10,000 be devoted to the maintenance, education, and support of this young child. Now, under the provisions of this amendment here this young man who is now being maintained, educated, and supported from this fund derived from the $10,000 will have that income cut in two, and I believe, Mr. Chairman, he will not only have it cut in two, but when he yields to the District government one-half of that income he will be compelled also under this bill to yield up again one-half of the remaining half, because under the provisions of this amendment savings-bank deposits are assessed and taxed at the full city rate, and then there is an additional tax put on an annuity. In other words, the bank to protect itself would pay this $1.50 out of the $3, and this young man to whom the balance of the $1.50 on each hundred was paid would be compelled to yield up 75 cents of that to the District government. In other words, instead of getting $300 he would only get $75, and be compelled to pay the District of Columbia $225 out of the $300 which he receives.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COADY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What was the theory of the committee in leaving him this $75?

Mr. COADY. I am surprised it even left him that. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit me right there——

Mr. COADY. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I might suggest if his estate is being managed on the same basis that a very large estate in the District of Columbia which is now in court is being managed, the committee, three of them, have in the last few years paid to themselves $100,000 for their own services.

Mr. COADY. That is aside from the question. I do not think the gentleman could have followed me, because I said the will provided that the money should be deposited in a savings bank in the District of Columbia and the income paid for the maintenance, education, and support of this young man. This is an entirely different case from that cited by the gentleman from Kentucky. Now, I have here reports from quite a number of States where commissions were appointed to investigate questions of this character, and uniformly all those commissions have reported a low tax rate on securities, varying from 30 to 40 cents. I have here a copy of a report of the United States Commissioner of Corporations on the success of the low tax rate. He says:

During the 12-year period (1898–1910) the percentages of increase in assessments for three States were as follows: Pennsylvania, 95 per cent; Connecticut, 89 per cent; Maryland (for Baltimore only), 161 per cent. The percentages of increase of revenue during the same period were: Pennsylvania, 95 per cent; Connecticut, 76 per cent; and Maryland (for Baltimore), 152 per cent. Looking only at the results attained in Baltimore (those for the whole State not being available), the low uniform-rate method of taxing intangible personalty may be regarded as having worked more successfully in Maryland than in Pennsylvania and Connecticut, notwithstanding the higher Maryland rate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these reports all show in States that have a tax rate like that in the State of Kentucky and in the State of Ohio the assessed value of intangible personal property has decreased from year to year, and, as I stated this morning, in the great State of Kentucky they get more revenue from the tax on dogs than they do from the tax on securities. I would like——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The District of Columbia also gets more tax on dogs than on intangible personal property.

Mr. COADY. Well, intangible personal property, as the gentleman well knows, is not now taxable in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If two and a half millions of people raise more tax on dogs than 350,000 people, it is pretty good evidence——

Mr. COADY. I am in favor of putting a fair rate on intangibles, not a confiscatory rate that would drive such property out of the District and would prevent you from getting it. Such has been the experience of every State in the Union that has tried to tax tangible personal property at the full rate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What feature of any of these propositions is the gentleman supporting which taxes intangible property?

Mr. COADY. I am in favor of taxing intangible personal property in the District at about 30 cents on the hundred. That is a fair rate, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. With reference to any measure that is before this House proposing that kind of tax on intangible property, which measure is the gentleman supporting?

Mr. COADY. I will say to the gentleman that I have an amendment prepared. I do not know what the parliamentary status of this bill will be later on; but, if I have an opportunity at the proper time, I will offer an amendment putting a tax of 30 cents on intangible property. You are taxing the same species of property under your amendment three and, in many cases, four times.

Prof. Bullock, who is professor of economics at Harvard University, and who has made a thorough study of this system of taxing intangible property at a low rate, says in his treatise on The Taxation of Intangible Property:

> If you will examine what has been written concerning the shortcomings of the tax on personal property in the United States, you will observe that the writers are dealing with a tax that is levied at a uniform rate upon all property, a rate which, in order to meet the increasing cost of local government—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAUCH). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COADY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COADY. I will continue—> a rate which, in order to meet the increasing cost of local government, has risen to an average of about $20 per $1,000 of the assessed capital value of the property. In some localities the rate falls to $10 per $1,000, or even less; but in many it rises to $30 per $1,000, and in not a few cases reaches such figures as $40 or $50. Now, the average rate of $20 per $1,000 of the capital value is equivalent to 40 per cent of the income from property that yields the investor 5 per cent interest, and safe investments do not show a higher average yield. When the tax rate rises to $30 or $40 it approaches the point of practical confiscation. No government that ever existed could collect such an exorbitant tax on any property that can possibly evade assessment either in whole or in part, and it is not surprising that our American States have been unable to do so. No sane man among us dreams of paying such a tax on his money, credits, or securities; and in most cases no law can long compel him to do so. The failure of our States to secure a full assessment of intangible wealth proves merely that it is impossible to collect from this class of property a tax so unreasonable and exorbitant as to be virtually uncollectible.

Now, without reading all these various reports, I will say that they treat this question in the same manner, and all make recommendations along the same line, namely, that in order to get at this property, in order to get at this great amount of intangible wealth, you must tax it at a fair rate, and most of them have held that a fair rate is about 30 cents on the hundred.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COADY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. What assurance have you that if you had a lower rate on the securities it would come from its hiding any more than now?

Mr. COADY. Nothing except the experience in the States that have tried it—Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut. I pointed out to the gentleman a week ago how in Baltimore city alone we had increased taxable intangible property about 150 or 175 per cent in 10 or 12 years.

Mr. FESS. Do you attribute the statement you made about Kentucky to the defective system of taxation there?

Mr. COADY. I attribute it to the fact that they tax intangibles at too high a rate, and in consequence they do not get it. The people of Kentucky do not turn them in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman there that we have a number of citizens here, any one of whom has more intangible property than all the people in Kentucky put together.

Mr. COADY. I am in favor of taxing these citizens. The gentleman knows that is my position, but I am not in favor of putting a confiscatory tax rate on them, and I am not in favor of driving men out of the District or making liars and perjurers of them. That has been the experience of every city that has undertaken to tax intangibles at full State and county rates.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the question pending before the House at the time of adjournment two weeks ago—the last District day—was the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] for the so-called George bill, which was reported by the majority of the Committee on the District of Columbia. This substitute, with the exception of a provision providing for a flexible rate of taxation on the personal-property assessment, as well as on the real property, according to the needs of the budget, is substantially the same as the original bill introduced by Mr. GEORGE before it was amended in the committee. The House therefore is now confronted with practically the same proposition that was before the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Under the existing law real estate within the District of Columbia is assessed only once in three years, and then at not to exceed two-thirds of its true value. Intangible personal property is not assessed at all, and there is exempt from taxation on the tangible personal property, first, libraries, schoolbooks, wearing apparel, articles of personal adornment, all family portraits, and heirlooms; second, household and other belongings to the value of $1,000.

The rate of taxation on the personal and real property as assessed is fixed at 1½ per cent. This has been the fixed rate since the passage of the organic act in 1878.

The expenses of the District government are paid one-half by the people of the District from revenues raised within the District and one-half is taken out of the Federal Treasury. The one-half of the expenses of the District government paid by the District is made up of license fees, certain specific taxes, and the taxes from the real and personal property assessment at the fixed rate of 1½ per cent.

It will be recalled that a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE], the author of this bill, was chairman during the last Congress, made an exhaustive investigation into the real-estate assessments in the District. That subcommittee reported that, as a matter of fact, the real estate within the District was only assessed at 44 per cent of its value, instead of two-thirds as required by law. They found that while the taxable real estate within the District was assessed for only $330,000,000, that it was really worth $744,000,000. Taking that report as the basis of our calculations, a little mathematical deduction will show that with real estate assessed at only 44 per cent of its true value, with the tax rate fixed at 1½ per cent upon that assessment, the owners of real estate within the District of Columbia are paying, under the existing law, only 6.6 mills on a dollar on the true value of their real estate. In addition, they are only paying 15 mills on a dollar upon their tangible personal property, with an extremely liberal exemption on that, and with all stocks, bonds, moneys, and other intangible personal property escaping taxation altogether.

Those of you who think that this is a fair rate of taxation, as compared with the rate in other cities, are justified in voting for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio and against the bill reported by a majority of the committee. You should, however, clearly understand the question before doing so. The substitute does not change the total amount to be raised within the District of Columbia. It does not change the existing law which requires the District to raise only one-half of the revenues to pay the expenses of the District government. It does not change the personal-property assessment. It differs from the existing law only in requiring an annual assessment on real estate instead of a triennial one; that such assessment shall be at its true value; and that the rate of taxation shall be fixed by the District Commissioners according to the requirements of the budget. It does not require any more money to be raised within the District than at present.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. I would like to ask the gentleman how much he thinks the citizens here ought to pay before going outside to get help?

Mr. MAPES. I think, if the gentleman please, that a tax rate of 1½ per cent on the full value of all taxable property in a city with the advantages of the city of Washington, the Capital City of this great Nation, is not too much, and for that reason I am supporting the bill that was reported by the majority of the committee. After the citizens of the District of Columbia pay a fair tax rate on the true value of their property, then I would be in favor, and I think every Member of this House would be in favor, of the Government contributing whatever is necessary to maintain a great National Capital.

Mr. OGLESBY. Why should the people throughout the country pay anything if it is to meet the expenses that the people here ought to meet?

Mr. MAPES. I will attempt to answer the question. I do not say that the people here ought to meet the entire expenses of the District government. I think, as I believe every other citizen of this country thinks, that the National Capital should be maintained on a standard perhaps that the citizens of the District of Columbia can not afford; but that is no reason why the citizens of the District of Columbia should escape taxation and should not be required to pay somewhere near the same amount that the people in other places pay who do not have the same advantages.

Mr. OGLESBY. Does the gentleman know what proportion of the property in the District is owned by the National Government?

Mr. MAPES. Approximately, yes.

Mr. OGLESBY. How much?

Mr. MAPES. About one-third of it.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is there any reason, then, why the Federal Government should not pay a third of the expenses of maintaining the District government?

Mr. MAPES. One-third is not one-half. We are paying one-half now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption there, I may say that it was stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] two weeks ago, and upon good authority, that the Federal Government owns in the District of Columbia 123 acres which it is now using for governmental purposes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further; my time is limited. I want to call attention particularly to the difference between the committee bill and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER]. His substitute does not change the total amount to be raised in the District. It does not change the existing law which requires the District to raise only one-half of the revenue. It does not change the personal-property assessment. It differs from the present system only by requiring an annual assessment instead of a triennial one, and that the assessment shall be at its true value, and that the rate shall be fixed by the District Commissioners according to the requirements of the budget. The committee bill requires all property, both real and personal, tangible and intangible, to be assessed annually and at its true value. It leaves the rate at 15 mills on a dollar as at present. Surely no one can justly complain of paying that amount on the full value of his property in a city like Washington with its unusual advantages.

Mr. IGOE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MAPES. Certainly.

Mr. IGOE. Under the substitute bill, if Congress should say that the District must raise all of its funds, can not the money be raised? Have not the commissioners the power to fix the rates so that the funds can be raised?

Mr. MAPES. That is true.

Mr. IGOE. Should not that be the purpose of this bill, to fix, first, an assessment system, and then allow the commissioners to fix the rate according to the needs of the District, whether the Government contributes anything or not?

Mr. MAPES. I think, perhaps, that the principal difference between the gentleman from Missouri and myself is on the starting point on this proposition. He believes, I think, that we will arrive at a fair proportion of what the Government should pay and what the District should raise by attacking the existing system, the way the substitute goes at it. For myself I believe we will arrive at that fair proportion sooner if we bring up the assessment to its true value and keep the tax rate of 1½ per cent, and by demonstrating beyond a doubt, as I think we will, that the rate of 1½ per cent on a true valuation will raise enough to take care of two-thirds or three-fourths of all of the expenses of the District of Columbia, so that the Federal Government will not be obliged to contribute anywhere near one-half. Now, I can not yield any further.

Mr. IGOE. But if we are going to raise the money arbitrarily, should not the commissioners have something to say about the rate?

Mr. MAPES. There has been an attempt in some quarters to becloud the issue raised by the bill by calling attention to the pride which everyone has for the National Capital, and arguing that it should be maintained on a larger and better scale than the residents of the District alone can afford, and that the National Government should contribute to its expenses. I am sure there is no Member of this House who would not have the Federal Government contribute to the support of the District government and the upkeep of the beautiful parks and boulevards within the District to whatever extent is necessary after the property and citizens of the District have paid a fair amount of taxes as compared with other cities of the country, but that is no reason why the property and the citizens of the District should not be required to pay their fair share of taxation. When the property within the District is subject to a tax rate which equals or approaches the rate paid in the other cities of the country, then there would be some force to that contention.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] has shown that the average amount paid in the cities throughout the country is 19 mills, based on a full valuation assessment, while in the District of Columbia at present it is only 10 mills, based on the present assessment, which is generally admitted to be very low, and which the George report says is only 44 per cent of its value.

In my home city of Grand Rapids, Mich., it is 21.4 mills on the dollar—more than double the amount paid in the District. In addition to the payment of 21.4 mills on the dollar for their local taxes, city, county, and State, the residents of the city of Grand Rapids are compelled to contribute their proportion of the one-half of the expense of the District government paid out of the Federal Treasury, although enjoying no direct benefits from that government. The amount that the citizens of the State of Michigan as a whole contribute toward the expenses of the District government, based upon the population of the State as compared to the population of the entire country, is $180,356, no insignificant sum.

Why should the citizens of Grand Rapids and other cities be obliged to contribute to the expenses of the District government until the citizens of the District pay somewhere near the amount paid by the citizens of Grand Rapids and of other cities to take care of their respective local governments? The citizens of the District get all the benefit of the beautiful parks, boulevards, public buildings, museums, art galleries, zoological park, schools, libraries, and so forth, of the city of Washington and of the District, while the people who reside outside of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia get no direct benefit from them whatever.

The District appropriation bill, as it passed the House, carried an appropriation for $11,436,150.49. Under the half-and-half plan the District would raise one-half of that amount, or $5,718,075.25. For the purpose of reducing these figures to round numbers let us say that the District's share of the annual appropriation is $6,000,000. The amount now raised within the District from licenses, specific taxes, and tangible personal property assessment, and so forth, is $2,187,000. This would leave a little less than $4,000,000 to be raised from the real-estate assessment. The real-estate assessment this year shows that the true value of the real estate within the District, according to the assessors, is $570,000,000. On this basis, if we pass this substitute, the real property in the District will pay a tax only of a trifle over 7 mills on the dollar of its true value as appraised by the assessors, and on the basis of the George report it will pay a tax of only 5.3 mills on the dollar of its true valuation.

The bill which a majority of the committee have reported merely provides for an annual assessment of real estate at its true value and for an assessment of intangible as well as tangible personal property. It does not attempt to change the rate of taxation, but leaves it as it is under existing law, at 1½ per cent. If it becomes a law, the property within the District will only pay a tax of 15 mills on a dollar, which is very much less than is paid in the average American city.

We believe that all property should be assessed. We believe that no one can rightly complain, and that it is eminently fair to the residents and citizens of the District of Columbia to ask them to contribute a tax rate of 1½ per cent on the value of their property before they ask the people of your district and mine, who pay a greater tax than this, to contribute to the expenses of the District government, from which they derive no personal benefit whatever.

There are many people of great wealth residing in Washington who have taken up their residence here because of the many advantages which the city affords. Some of them may have been influenced to select this as their permanent domicile on account of the liberal tax laws, for which Congress is responsible. This class are abundantly able to pay their fair share of taxation, but under the system in vogue at present of exempting all intangible property, such as stocks, bonds, moneys, and so forth, they pay very little taxes in proportion to their wealth. Those of you who wish to make this a retreat for the rich to escape taxation are justified in voting for the substitute, but those of you who believe that all property, whether in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, should pay its fair share of taxation should vote for the bill reported by the majority of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has agreed to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GORMAN], who is a member of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, that I may revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to throw much light on this situation nor to take very long. First, we had the George bill, I believe, in the last Congress. Then we had a George bill introduced in this Congress. The committee reported that bill with certain amendments, so that it amounted practically to a substitute for the George bill. Then we had, when the first section of that substitute bill was read, the Crosser substitute, a substitute for the two propositions. Now we have the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], which is another substitute for the entire proposition.

It is "going some" when you have four propositions presented to you, each as a substitute for the one which preceded it; and apparently only a few gentlemen in the House know very much about it. I am one of those who do not pretend to know a great deal about it; but so far as I have gathered from listening to the debate, all of these propositions depend upon an assumption to begin with, that the figures of a Mr. Brown in reference to the actual valuation of real estate in the District of Columbia are taken to be true. I assume that Mr. Brown is one of those distinguished gentlemen who are able to juggle with figures.

I remember, when I was a young lawyer, being sent one time to interview a man who was probably at that time the most noted expert on handwriting in the city of Chicago. I took two specimens of handwriting to him—two signatures. One side claimed that the same man had signed them, and the other side claimed he had not. This expert was not a man who came to your office; you had to go to his house to get a chance to see him. Having arranged an interview, I went to see him and laid the two signatures before him and asked him whether those two signatures were signed by the same person. He retired to another room, examined the signatures under a microscope, and in various other ways, and came back still undecided. I had not told him which side of the case I was on. Making some inquiry as to whether there was any corroborative proof, I finally indicated that I thought there was corroborative proof upon the side I was on, indicating that I thought the signatures were signed by the same man; and very promptly this distinguished expert was able to tell, then, that they were signed by the same individual. Well, that is much like Mr. Brown's figures. Mr. Brown starts out to prove a case. If he had been endeavoring to prove that the valuation of real estate in Washington was too large, he would have proved it with the same figures, the same information that he had before him. Yet this distinguished committee accepts as genuine and as a certain fact the opinion of a professional expert as to the real value of real estate in the city of Washington in the face of the sworn performance of duty by the District assessors.

I know enough about real-estate valuation in the city of Washington and elsewhere to feel quite competent to put my judgment up against Mr. Brown's, and I believe that, on the present valuation by the District assessors in the District of Columbia, District real estate is valued higher in proportion to its actual value than real estate is valued in any other city in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Here is a residence city which has some valuable retail-store property, but practically no wholesale-store property, and not engaged in the wholesale business to any great extent. Yet on the figures which are submitted here by the District assessors, in my judgment, on the property in the District of Columbia, without manufacturing and without wholesale business, and without taking into consideration the principal business of Washington, which is Government business, they make a valuation here higher than it is in any other city of the same size in the United States.

Now, the tax rate here is supposed to be 1 per cent on the actual value. I remember, as a boy and since, reading how at one time it was supposed that you paid tithes of taxes, 10 per cent of the increase; and yet we have got to that point now where in our day, when we are supposed to cut off a great many of the extravagances of the past, we now levy taxes amounting to 20 per cent of the increase, assuming the increase to be 5 per cent on the capitalization. When it is less than that the rate of taxes is higher. Of course, where the income is greater the taxes are lower. One per cent taxes annually on the actual value of property is enough for anybody to pay properly, and I doubt whether any of the cities which are upon the chart before us, where a higher rate of taxation prevails theoretically, are in fact really paying more than 1 per cent on the actual value, anywhere in the country. Of course, if you manufacture the actual value yourself, it is easy to say that the rate of taxation is higher.

I can remember in my town years ago when the assessed valuation in the portion of the community where I lived was 10 per cent of the supposed valuation, and even the "actual valuation" was not more than one-half or one-third of the real valuation. People thought their taxes were high then. So, Mr. Chairman, I think the people of Washington pay high enough taxes now. All of these theories that they ought to increase the taxation here are based upon an assumed state of facts which, in my judgment, does not exist. I am content with the present method—by which the Government pays one-half of the expenses in the District of Columbia and the people of the District pay the other half. I have no desire to cut off or destroy the method of municipal government here by which we maintain streets in better condition on the average than they are maintained in any other city in the country, by which we keep them cleaner than they are kept in any other city of the country; by which we have a better garbage-collection service than they have in any other city in the country; by which we maintain street signs that can be easily seen and read, which is not true of any other city in the country that I have ever visited. We conduct a better government here than is conducted in any other city in the country. Perhaps one reason of that is that we do not have quite as many problems growing out of a large wholesale and manufacturing business. I am willing, and I believe that the people of the country are willing, to contribute one-half to the payment of the expenses of the maintenance of this city.

At one time, when I lived in a house in Washington, I paid taxes on personal property, though I did not think I was obliged to. I doubt whether many of the Members of Congress who come here and live in homes do pay taxes on their personal property. According to the theory of my friend from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], if they do, they have no right to vote on this proposition. If they do not, they are defrauding the District of Columbia, because a man who comes here and maintains a house and keeps his furniture here and pays taxes on it at home instead of here is not acting fairly to the rest of the people in the District of Columbia. So that a man who is in a house here is in a very bad position. According to my friend from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], he has no right to take part in the discussion or vote upon this proposition because he pays taxes here; and if he does not pay taxes, he is defrauding the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; I always yield.

Mr. PROUTY. The gentleman is misquoting me. I have never discussed that phase of the question at all.

Mr. MANN. If I had not heard the gentleman discuss it, I would not have said anything; but I am perfectly willing to take the gentleman's statement.

Mr. PROUTY. My speech is in the RECORD, and the gentleman ought to be able to verify my statement.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman takes exception to it—and I am glad he sees even now that his proposition was a foolish one—I will put it off on some other gentleman. A number of them have made the claim.

Now, I do not pay any taxes in the District of Columbia; do not own any property here. I suppose I am permitted to express an opinion. I notice some figures posted up here, and this is about the way this information is obtained: Present District appropriation bill, House, $11,436,000; Senate, $13,137,000; average, $12,286,000; one-half of this, $6,143,000. Then it goes on and makes a computation of the amount of money necessary to be raised to pay this, as though that was the entire appropriation for the District of Columbia. The distinguished gentleman, whoever he is—and I do not know who presented this chart—does not even know, with all of his study of the subject, that all of the appropriations for the District of Columbia are not contained in the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

You would have supposed that the gentleman, whoever he was, knew before he prepared these figures that a portion of the appropriations for carrying on the District, payable partly by the District and partly by the United States, are carried in the general deficiency and the sundry civil bills. We even make the District pay half of the care of the Washington Monument grounds. I suppose that some gentlemen think the Washington Monument grounds are purely a local affair, and hence ought to be paid wholly by the District of Columbia. That is one of the items that we make the District pay half of. We make the District pay half the cost of the construction of sidewalks on Executive Avenue and on the south side of the Treasury Building in the recent appropriation law, not carried in the District appropriation bill. We put a good many burdens on the District of Columbia. We make them pay half the expense of buying the fancy animals that we maintain at the Zoo, which would not be maintained in Washington except that it is one of the arms of the National Government for the purpose of education and instruction.

But some gentlemen would say that is maintained wholly for the benefit of the local people and that they ought to pay for it. We put a good many burdens on the District. We keep down salaries—and properly so, in my judgment—of people who work for the Government. We keep out of the manufacturing business if we can; we prevent the District becoming a wholesale center as far as we have the power. We want to maintain a beautiful city, so that we may show it to our constituents and feel proud of it.

Who is there here who has not gone around the city of Washington with his constituents and bragged—yes, bragged—upon the beauty of Washington? If there be one so little that he has not done that, he is too little for me to address. [Laughter and applause.]

I am proud of the Capital of the country, proud of the way it is maintained, proud of the Government here, proud of the Government buildings and Government business here, proud of our streets and parks and avenues, proud of all that is carried on in the District of Columbia, and quite willing that we should continue to contribute toward its support, in spite of the professional figures of Mr. Brown, whoever he may be. [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I approve of much of what the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COADY] said about the unwisdom of this act by which it is proposed to tax real estate, tangible property, and intangible personal property all by the same plan and at the same rate. I agree with what he said, that that is unscientific and antiquated, and that every effort to carry out such a law meets with disappointment and dismal failure. It is easy for us to say that the owners of large wealth, personal property, consisting of money, mortgages, bonds, and other kinds of credits, should contribute in taxes to the support of the community in which the owners live. It is easy to work up a feeling when discussing that phase of the question, but my experience leads me to the opinion that every time an effort is made to assess money, mortgages, and credits of whatever kind by the same plan that real estate and tangible property is assessed and impose the same rate upon both there is a failure of justice, an inequality, and a hardship is imposed not only upon the owners of the intangible property but upon those who would seek to get the benefit of it by borrowing; that is, the debtor class.

Every effort to assess money and credits drives that kind of property out of the district where the attempt is made. Rates of interest are increased and the burden falls upon the borrowers.

There is another form in which there is injustice to the owner of the credit. We are told here that under the law real estate and tangible personal property are to be assessed at their full value—one hundred cents on the dollar—and that money and all kinds of credits are to be assessed in the same way, at full value.

Now, see how these two kinds of property will actually be assessed. The assessor looks at a piece of real estate reasonably worth $10,000, and in his mind he believes it is worth $10,000, but by a process of reasoning satisfactory to himself he reaches the figure of $5,000 or $6,000, and puts that amount upon the assessment roll as the amount at which that piece of property shall pay taxes. And in some way he justifies the figure; at least he makes it stand. But here is a credit, money in the bank, $10,000. The assessor knows it is there, the owner of it must disclose it, and when the assessing officer comes to put a value on it for taxing purposes he can by no process of reasoning say it is worth only $5,000 or $6,000; he must assess it as the law requires, at full value, $10,000.

That is the way in which this law is actually carried out. I have seen it done in years of my experience, and money pays usually twice the rate that tangible property or real estate pays.

Some will say, Why legislate in favor of money? Why assess money, as the gentleman from Maryland suggests, at a specific rate of three-tenths of a cent on a dollar while you assess real estate at one cent and a half on the dollar? We legislate against money. We do not let money as a credit earn more than 5 or 6 per cent; otherwise it is usury. Then why not give money or credits some benefit or advantage, especially if justice is thereby produced and if borrowers will be benefited even more than the owners of the money? I insist that justice to the people who would borrow money as well as justice to those who lend it—consideration of the entire proposition—requires that there should be a different method of assessment of the two kinds of property. Experience has shown that they do not work well together. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, if the Congress of the United States passes this bill providing for the taxation of intangible personal property at the same rate as real estate, it will take a step backward, a step away from the policy of the most enlightened States, a step in opposition to the best economic thought of the world. The local taxation of intangible personal property, as a part of the old general property tax, has everywhere broken down, and has broken down because it ought to break down. The most enlightened States have taken steps to abolish it. The State of Washington has abolished taxation of instruments of credit. Shall the city of Washington be behind the State of Washington?

Gentlemen have said that millionaires move to the District of Columbia to escape the taxation of intangible personal property. From what States? Certainly not from the State of Washington and certainly not from the great empire State of New York, which has more millionaires residing in it than any other State or any group of States of similar area; more, in fact, than in all the Western and Southern States combined. We do not tax intangible personal property locally in New York State except in rare instances, and most of it is either exempt by law, as municipal and State bonds, or taxed at a low specific rate by the State and exempted from local assessment.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman please give the reason why you do not tax intangible property in New York?

Mr. PLATT. We do not tax intangible property in New York State, because the efforts to tax it have been a failure and because it is unfair and unjust. In place of local taxation of intangible property we have put a small specific tax on most of it. Mortgages pay one-half of 1 per cent at the time of the record, and that is for all time, or as long as they run. Bonds are exempt if based upon New York State mortgages which have paid the recording tax. If based upon outside mortgages, the bonds are exempted upon payment of a similar registration tax—that is, one-half of 1 per cent.

It is perfectly evident if that were not the case that nearly all of the bonds that are sold in the bond market would be sold on a nontaxable basis; that is, at lower prices. Nobody in his senses would pay par for a 4 per cent bond and have a local tax rate of 2 per cent taken out of it, the bond yielding him only 2 per cent. We have been selling and buying these things for years upon the basis that they would be free from taxation in the great markets of the State of New York, and in nearly all other markets, and yet gentlemen say they ought to be taxed. When we do tax them, the tax comes out of the borrowers every time.

There is another instrument of credit that I think is still nominally taxable in the State of New York, and that is a note. If you borrow a thousand dollars of me, I have your note, and you have the thousand dollars. Nominally, I think, a note of that kind is still taxable, if no security is given, as the law applies to secured debt. Of course they never are taxed except occasionally when they are in the hands of some widow or orphan where an estate has gone through the probate court and has to be made public. If they were taxed, it would simply raise the rate of interest that much. The whole thing is absolutely unfair. Stocks in corporations of the State of New York are not taxed, and that means that practically no stocks are taxed, except rarely; and they ought not to be. If you and I are in partnership and have a business worth $100,000, we will say, our property is perfectly evident to everybody. Here is our plant and our machinery, and we are making so much money. Suppose we incorporate it and issue $100,000 worth of stock. Have we created any more property? Is there anything more to tax than there was before? Intangible personal property is either evidence of debt or evidence of divided ownership. And there is no just reason for taxing it at all. If it is taxed at all, it should be taxed at a small specific rate or reached through the income tax.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the bill that was introduced by Mr. GEORGE, and the amendment that is proposed by Judge PROUTY, and the Crosser substitute, and the Johnson amendment, and the half-and-half plan, and the various other topics that we have discussed here, I think has resulted in developing confusion in the minds of some of the Members as to just what this controversy is about. The Sixty-second Congress, having before it some matters pertaining to assessment and taxation in the District of Columbia, appointed a committee to investigate and inquire into that subject. As a result of a very careful, painstaking investigation, that committee reported back a method by which, in the judgment of the committee, real estate in the District of Columbia could be justly and equitably taxed. The bill that was presented to this House, known as the George bill, was based upon and is a crystallization of that investigation. There was no investigation made nor any attempt to investigate, made at that time and, so far as I know, before or since then by that House or any other, and certainly not by this, into the subject of assessment and taxation of personal property. The George bill provides that all real estate in the District of Columbia shall be assessed at its full value. Upon that all of the members of the District Committee and, I take it for granted, all of the Members of this House are agreed. The George bill made no attempt to deal with the subject of the taxation or assessment of personal property. The gentleman from Iowa, Judge PROUTY, proposed an amendment to the George bill providing that personal property, both tangible and intangible, should be assessed at the same rate at which real estate is to be assessed. It has been stated here in this House that those who voted against the Prouty amendment in committee are opposed to the assessment and taxation of stocks and bonds. I want to say now, so that the RECORD will disclose it, that I am not opposed to the assessment and taxation of stocks and bonds, but I am in favor of an investigation and study of the subject of assessment and taxation of tangible and intangible personal property that will enable this House to act upon that subject just as intelligently as this House is now enabled to act upon the subject of the assessment and taxation of real estate, as the result of the George investigation. [Applause.]

The amendment that was submitted here to-day by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is submitted at the last minute, during the closing hours of this debate, without the Members of the House having had any opportunity to study and analyze it, and if it is better than either the original George bill or the George bill with the Prouty amendment added to it, I would still be opposed to it, because, in my judgment, it is not wise that this body should act hastily upon any matter of any consequence, particularly a matter as important as the taxation of people who have no representation in this body.

I believe that the people of the United States ought to contribute something to the maintenance of the National Capital. I would be ashamed to feel or know that the people of the District of Columbia were maintaining the National Government here in Washington at their expense and that the people of my district and the people throughout the country were not contributing anything toward the support and maintenance of the National Capital. The Government of the United States did not come here and locate its Capital in the District of Columbia at the request of the people of this District. The Government located its Capital here and then invited the people to come here and help make this one of the most beautiful cities in the world, and I believe that the people who have come here at the invitation of the Government of the United States to help make this a beautiful city should have the assistance of those who live throughout the country in maintaining the Capital of the Nation in a style becoming to the Capital of our Republic! The people of the United States should pay something to the support of the Nation's Capital. Whether it should be one-half or one-quarter or one-third I do not know. I am inclined to think that payment by the people of the United States of one-half of the expense of maintaining the government of the District of Columbia is more than the people ought to pay, but until we have arrived at some definite conclusion as to what would be just and fair for the people to pay I am in favor of maintaining the existing system, by virtue of which the people of the United States pay one-half.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Congress ought to appoint a committee to investigate, or to delegate to some standing committee of the House the duty of investigating and inquiring into the subject of taxation of personal property, both tangible and intangible, so that as the result of such an investigation this Congress can act intelligently upon the subject of taxation of that kind.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Did the gentleman notice in the press reports a few days ago that a man named C. W. Post, of Battle Creek, Mich., had committed suicide, and that he was a legal resident of the District of Columbia?

Mr. GORMAN. I did read that the gentleman had committed suicide, but I did not read that he was a resident of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman did not observe that?

Mr. GORMAN. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, that was carried in a newspaper statement, that Mr. Post was a legal resident of the District of Columbia, and that probably will be verified in the settlement of his estate. Now, do you apprehend that his being a legal resident of the District of Columbia had anything to do with the amount he paid in personal taxes?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say Mr. Post was a legal resident?

Mr. BORLAND. I say that was carried in the newspaper statement.

Mr. MANN. Yet the gentleman is proceeding to base a lot more argument on that statement, which is——

Mr. BORLAND. Has the gentleman any further information?

Mr. MANN. That that statement is not true.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me just one word?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Did not the statement which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] saw state that Mr. Post simply owned a house? A man might own a house and yet not be a resident, and I doubt very much whether he was a resident, because I think he voted in the State of Michigan.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. I yielded for a question only.

Mr. BORLAND. That is not what I saw at all.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Chairman, on the matter of taxing intangible personal property, I find myself in the position that I was in when I came to this House and the tariff bill was under discussion. Without having given any thought to the subject, or, rather, any study, I supposed diamonds ought to be taxed as high as the traffic would bear. I was in favor of imposing a tax on diamonds so high that there would not be any more of them imported. I thought it was good doctrine—that people who could afford to wear diamonds ought to pay well for the support of the Government. They are luxuries, nobody wears them except as a luxury, but I learned on investigation that the experience of the Treasury Department was to the effect that if the taxation on diamonds was above a certain percentage that they derived no revenue whatever out of the importation of diamonds, and the Government was under an enormous expense in hunting down those who were smuggling diamonds into the country. This suggested to my mind that the purpose of all taxation measures is to raise revenue, and if you legislate in such a way as to drive intangible property under cover you will not raise revenue, but you will force men to become perjurers. Now, the question has been asked here, At what point in the rate of percentages will men cease to be honest?

I do not know at what point men will cease to be honest in that regard, but I believe that a man who has a security which represents property already taxed, and believes that he is being taxed upon that security to an extent that it does not pay him to carry it, you will drive that man to conceal his property, and I would rather that the Congress of the United States would so legislate with reference to intangible personal property as to bring it out from under cover and let it be taxed for something, even though the rate assessed may not be as much as, in the judgment of Congress, it ought to be. But if we do so legislate we can raise more revenue and relieve the burden of taxation upon those who have property that can not be concealed, and you will be doing some good for the people who have that kind of property which can not be concealed and upon which the burden of taxation falls heaviest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, something has been said here in regard to the accuracy of newspaper reports about affairs in the District of Columbia. On last District day, when this bill was under discussion, I referred to a newspaper article of the sale of a piece of real estate in the District of Columbia. Immediately thereafter I received a letter from the agent who made the sale and who particularly requested that I give publicity to the statement which he made. I send to the desk the letter of the agent and my reply and his reply to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 29, 1914.

Hon. W. B. BORLAND,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR SIR: As a lifelong militant Democrat I dislike to see Members of Congress of my own party fall into the error of using newspaper articles as a basis for an argument and to accept such articles as fact.

You have unfortunately fallen into this error in your speech in the House touching the question of taxation in the District of Columbia and using the article in the Washington Post purporting to give a correct account of the history of property known as 1335 E Street NW., which I recently contracted to sell to Mr. Munsey.

The facts involved in this transaction are not known to anyone outside of the parties immediately concerned, and the only exact statement of fact in the Post article was that a contract had been closed for the sale of the property to Mr. Munsey.

I have personally had charge of this property for nearly 20 years, and the property was not purchased by the present owner, as stated in the newspaper article, 40 years ago, but was inherited from her father and has been in possession of the same ownership for more than 70 years. During my entire control and management of this property, as the agent for the owner, it has never been offered for sale. So that the statement that a financier declined to purchase same five years ago for $35,000 is manufactured out of whole cloth, as is the statement that the owner purchased the property 40 years ago for $1,600. Absolutely untrue, for the reason that she inherited the property from her father, who acquired same when she was a little girl, and she is now in her eightieth year. Nor has anyone any exact information as to the purchase price. I can state, upon my knowledge as a real-estate broker of over 27 years' active experience in the business, that the property is not worth, or any property in that block, more than from $20 to $22.50 per square foot; that some fancy prices have been paid to satisfy the personal ambition of certain people is true, but that the sound commercial value from an investment standpoint does not exceed my figures; and your argument, which I have read, based upon the misinformation which you had, is an injury to the people of the District of Columbia and an error which I am sure you would not have made had you been possessed of the facts in the premises.

I wish you would correct same, otherwise I will have to give the facts to some one who will. I am sure you would not wittingly use misinformation, but unfortunately you have fallen into this error.

With great respect, I am,
Very truly, yours,

J. L. HEISKELL.

APRIL 30, 1914.

Mr. JESSE L. HEISKELL,
1403 H Street NW., Washigton, D. C.

DEAR MR. HEISKELL: I am glad to have statement over your signature that matter appearing in the Washington newspapers in regard to the affairs of the District of Columbia is almost universally inaccurate. I have never made this charge myself, although I have been astonished at the statements in regard to District affairs which have been published to the world through the Washington papers.

I shall be very glad to give your letter publicity at the earliest opportunity, probably when the debate is renewed upon the next District day. In order that I may be perfectly accurate this time I ask now for you to give me the actual selling price of the property at 1335 E Street NW. and also the amount of rent paid by Mr. Engle and any other tenants of the property. Please give me this reply at once, in order that I may make a complete and accurate statement. In the absence of a reply from you on this important point I shall call attention of Congress to your letter and to my reply as herein expressed.

With kindest regards, I am,
Yours, truly,

WM. P. BORLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1914.

Hon. W. P. BORLAND,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of the 30th ultimo and note contents. Permit me to say, however, that I did not state "that matter appearing in the Washington newspapers in regard to the affairs of the District of Columbia is universally inaccurate." I did state that I regretted that you had fallen into the error of using a newspaper article, such as you did, with regard to a specific transaction as a basis of fact. As a public man you well know that newspaper articles are invariably incorrect.

I can not give you the sale price of the property, for the reason that my client, the owner, for private and family reasons requested me not to make same public, and I submit that she is entitled to protection in her purely private affairs and that the public is not concerned in purely private transactions in real estate; that they are entitled to the same privacy as individuals with regard to their personal property which the law safeguards and recognizes the justice, if not the right, of, when in the recent income-tax measure it provided a heavy penalty for any collector to disclose the return of any individual.

I further submit that the price at which this property sold has nothing to do with its staple value. In the same block, just west, with handsome improvements, a much more desirable property has been for sale to settle an estate for some years. It has been offered at public auction within about 12 months, and a bid could not be had at $20 per square foot, including the improvements, which are of a permanent character and well rented.

The purchaser of 1335 E Street NW. is the only buyer who would pay the price which he did for this property, and he only did so in order to complete and carry out a project of his own.

Again, the property has never been offered for sale, and the owner declined proffers of purchase for the reason that the property had been in her family for over 70 years, and while she considered the price offered more than the property was worth, she was disinclined to sell and had to be tempted by a fancy figure.

The property rents for $400 per month, which is a top figure paid for a long lease and for a special licensed business which universally pays higher rentals than any other class of business. It actually netted the owner, after payment of taxes, insurance, commissions, etc., about $3,800 per annum. At this figure you can easily fix the value of the property by capitalizing same, as money is readily worth on first deed of trust or mortgage, well secured, 5½ to 6 per cent.

There is no business demand in this locality that would warrant the purchase and improvement of any like amount of property at any such figures as $18 to $20 per square foot. Why do I say this? Because there is plenty of other property in better business sections with better chances of improvement that can be acquired at these figures, and the fancies or whims of individuals, expressed in their private purchases, are the necessities of individuals when compelled to pay fancy prices to induce owners to sell, are certainly no criterions of value. For instance, in my 27 years' experience I have purchased land at 50 cents per square foot, which it was not worth, and sold it within a few months at $2.50, which, of course, it was not worth; but the necessity of the parties acquiring same was such that they had to pay the price I put on it.

Further, I submit that your argument or reasoning from the basis of the transactions which you used in Congress was not sound, for the reason that you knew nothing of the real considerations or elements entering into the transactions that produced the prices actually paid. The monetary consideration is one element and reflects nothing but the view of the purchaser, which in the end is but the satisfaction of his whim, and he could not resell his purchase at a discount often of from 10 to 30 per cent. I am,

Very respectfully,

J. L. HEISKELL.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have given publicity to these letters, in justice to Mr. Heiskell, because apparently he is only the agent in this transaction and has the right to make his statement, as much right, of course, as I have to refer to the facts within my knowledge. So I have given his statement in full without any attempt to draw any inference of my own from it. But you will notice two facts from his statement. One is that he declines my express request to give the real consideration of that sale. The newspapers stated it was $100,000. Mr. Heiskell declines to tell us what it was, but intimates it was a fancy figure. I based my statement on $100,000.

If the price was less than $100,000, I am inclined to think that the owner would be glad to take advantage of the lower price by declaring it was less than $100,000, but that is their business and not ours. But I do not agree with the statement that the consideration of the sale is no part of public business. I can not agree with that statement at all, because I think it is the basis of the value of real property and the basis of our rate of taxing it. Nor can I agree with his statement that the place being rented now for $400 is no evidence of its final value, because I know the condition of that property. I know that it is a two-story brick building, constructed a number of years ago, with comparatively slight development. The improvements on that block consist of buildings of much larger and more expensive type, and in my judgment, and in the judgment, I think, of any man familiar with city values, that property is unimproved, from a business standpoint.

Now, if it rents for $400 a month, and it is unimproved or underimproved estate, the $400 a month is not the criterion of its productive value, and on that point Mr. Heiskell and I would disagree. But whatever the real value of the property may be, that real value ought to be the basis of taxation. That is the important part, as far as this statement is concerned. I believe that the real property in this District ought to be assessed on the same basis and made to pay substantially the same rate of taxes that similarly situated real property would pay in any other city in the United States. That is not a question of beautifying this Capital, because that is being done by Congress, and in many cases without expense to the District at all. But it is a question of whether real property located in the District of Columbia shall have any special low rate of taxation or special rate of assessment over what it would have in any other city for a similar business purpose. And I contend that all through this argument it has been clearly shown that property in the District of Columbia is underassessed in comparison with property in other cities of the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, my interest in this sort of legislation is not because I am a Member of Congress, except in the degree that I want to perform my duty in voting to the best of my judgment, and it is not because I am temporarily residing in the Capital City. But my interest is from the standpoint of a citizen of Ohio and a citizen of the United States. I have such a pride in the Capital of our country, as a citizen of the State of Ohio, residing away from this Capital, that I feel we ought to maintain here at the Capital a city the status and grandeur of which would not be maintained unless the Federal Government did give a certain degree of support. And I have feared, from the trend of argument delivered by the proponents of this bill, and the answer to questions that have been put, that one purpose of this legislation is for the General Government to free itself of any burden in supporting the Capital City of the Nation. I do not believe that there is any less reason to-day than when the Capital was located here that the General Government should not retain its authority in the District of Columbia. In other words, the same reasons exist now that were apparent then. The very reason, for the first President of the Nation, in obedience to an act of Congress, selected this site, which was then without a city, but a mere collection of houses, in preference to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or Richmond, that same reason is to-day apparent that we ought to maintain the control of the Capital City. Indeed, there are many reasons that it is unnecessary now for me to specify. And if we do anything as the Congress legislating for the Nation to maintain the control of the District, then I am sure that we ought not to try to free ourselves from the burden of making it not only a more beautiful city than it otherwise could possibly be, but the best-governed city of the world. And when I look upon these beautiful streets, for they are more beautiful, better kept, cleaner, better wooded, if you will allow me to use that expression, and when I observe the system of parks, more beautiful than in any other city I know of anywhere in the country, I think that if we can maintain these in the form that they are, even without the support of the Nation, we ought not to force upon the resident people of the city the entire burden simply because we can, if we still maintain the control of the District.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Ohio believe that a failure to tax stocks, bonds, and securities of that description tends to make the city more beautiful?

Mr. FESS. I would not want, Mr. Chairman, to make the District of Columbia or the Capital of the Nation a refuge for people to come to in order to get rid of taxation. I would oppose that proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Do I understand from the gentleman's answer that he is in favor of taxing those securities now, or will be for a proposition, which will come very shortly, to tax them?

Mr. FESS. I am in favor of taxing the intangible property here as well as in other places. I do not want our Capital City to be a refuge where men can come and free themselves from or escape the burden of taxation. But I do not mean that we will place all the burdens of the taxation for the District of Columbia, the domicile of the Nation's Capital, upon the residents of this city. If we do, then I think we are in honor bound to move out, figurately speaking, and let the government of this District and this Capital City be in the hands of the people who bear the burdens. That is a position I can not take. There are reasons why the policing of this city, the protection of it, the sanitation of it, and every phase of its government should be kept within the control of the General Government, for this is not a city simply for the resident who lives here; it is the Capital City of the hundred millions of people throughout this country, who feel an ownership of which they are proud; and because of that I do not want to place all the burden of taxation upon the people living here, but I want to assume a part of it as a citizen of Ohio. I will not have to pay more than about 7 cents annually, you will not have to pay more than about 7 cents, in order that the Nation does its part. And I am willing and the people in my district are willing—I have not consulted them, but I know that they have pride enough in the capital of the country, as the most beautiful city in all the country—to bear a little burden to keep it as it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. And before I shall vote for any measure or any amendment that will repeal the organic law I want to have time to study, through an investigation, in order to know what is to be the outcome of the change. As I see it now, it is not possible for me to vote either for the original bill or for the substitute or for the amendment, for you have not yet convinced me that you are not going to disorganize the plan of government in the city and that we are not going to free ourselves from the burden that partly belongs to us. Therefore I can not support what is before the House. [Applause.]

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am going to ask permission to be excused from voting on this proposition, for the reason that I have come to the conclusion that I am an interested party. I would like, however, to have the permission of the committee to give expression to one or two ideas that seem to me to bear somewhat on the situation.

Now, in support of the proposition that I am an interested party, I point to the lower line on this card in front of us, which says that, based upon the actual valuation of property here, the rate of taxation is 6½ mills. It so happens that when I had the honor to be elected to represent the twenty-fourth district of New York in Congress I came down to find some place to stay while I was here. I found that the rental value of property was very high in proportion to the sale value. It was not hard to find out why. We have a shifting population. People who have houses either for sale or rent have opportunities to rent that they do not have for sale. But the sale value of property is fixed very largely by its rental value.

Now, the proposition here is to raise the rate of taxation from 6½ cents to 15 cents. That means either that the owner of the property must raise the rent, in which case every gentleman here who rents a house would also be disqualified from voting, or it means that the valuation of the property would be reduced, because if your valuations are based on rental returns, then the net rental return would be reduced by 8.5 cents. On a piece of property worth $10,000 at the present rate of taxation it would be reduced by $850. The gentlemen all assume to take the position that they are not disqualified to vote on this proposition—gentlemen who are renting houses.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Is that 6½ cents or 6½ mills. The gentleman said "6½ cents." I did not understand whether that was 6½ cents or 6½ mills. Does it mean 6½ mills?

Mr. OGLESBY. Oh, it depends on what you use as the unit. It does not make any difference. I assume that if the gentlemen here who are renting property believed that an increase in the rate of taxation would increase the rentals which they would have to pay, they would conclude that being interested parties they could not vote on this proposition. It therefore seems to be the consensus of opinion that the result would be to lessen the sale value of the property.

Now, I believe that one reason why property values are so high in the city of Washington is because the rental values are high and because the tax rate is low.

Mr. PROUTY. Now you are guessing. [Laughter.]

Mr. OGLESBY. I see my friend from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] agrees with that proposition. But I say that this bill is the most unscientific hodge-podge that I have ever had the privilege of considering. [Laughter.]

Mr. PROUTY. Now you see I am not smiling. [Laughter.]

Mr. OGLESBY. The gentleman from Iowa does not smile. They propose instead of having the rate follow the budget to have the budget follow the rate; in other words, they fix an arbitrary rate of taxation that the citizens in Washington have to pay—fix it at 15 cents. They say the assessed valuation shall be 100 cents on the dollar, and if it produces more than the budget requirements, we assume the balance of the money stays in the National Treasury; and if it produces less, they say, "Well, that is enough for them to have to pay, so we will ask our constituents at home to make up the deficit, because the people here are not able to pay any more than a rate of 15 cents."

I do not want to ask my people to pay one cent that the people of the District of Columbia ought in justice to pay. I have to pay taxes in the District of Columbia, because I bought a house down here believing that it was cheaper than to rent one. I paid in taxes last year $400 in the State of New York where I pay $1 in Washington. I do not know whether it would make any special difference to me whether the rate is lessened here or increased in New York, or whether it is increased here or lessened in New York under that provision.

But here in the District I find, in looking over the appropriation bill for the District, introduced in March, 1914, that a part of the money is appropriated for the street-cleaning division in the city. Now, it is estimated that about two-fifths of the property of the District of Columbia is owned by the National Government. The lowest estimate I have seen is that one-fourth of the used property—that is, outside of the parks and the streets—belongs to the National Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. OGLESBY. There is no analogy between the Government-owned property in the District of Columbia and the statehouse and other State property in a city in which a State capital is located in some State. The difference is that in the latter instance the State capital is located there because there is a city. Washington is a city, because the National Capital is located here. In the city of New York the post-office building is owned by the National Government. A customhouse is owned by the National Government. The National Government does not pay any taxes on that, it is true; but it is such a small proportion, such a small part of that city, the taxes would not amount to a pinch of snuff.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. OGLESBY. Certainly.

Mr. PROUTY. Why should they not pay in New York?

Mr. OGLESBY. Because in New York, as well as in other cities throughout the country, they are willing for the National Government to have a building there for the transaction of the business of the Government, as a matter of convenience to the citizens there, and to have it without imposing any share of the taxes, it being so small in amount that it is practically inconsiderable.

Mr. PROUTY. Is it not because they propose to get some benefit from it?

Mr. OGLESBY. I say it is more or less of a convenience to the people there.

Mr. PROUTY. If a small amount is enough to offset the disadvantages, would not a larger amount more than offset them?

Mr. OGLESBY. Well, if the same reasoning applied, that would be so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was very much interested in the gentleman's remarks. Does the gentleman think that the nonpayment of taxes upon property owned by the National Government in New York is a mere matter of convenience?

Mr. OGLESBY. I say that in New York we do not insist that the National Government shall pay taxes on its property. That is, we are willing that the Government shall own property in the city of New York without payment of taxes thereon, because it is more or less a matter of convenience for us to have a post office and a customhouse located there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it a matter of willingness or unwillingness on the part of the people of the city or the State? Have you authority to levy taxes there on Government property?

Mr. OGLESBY. I say it is a matter of convenience to the people of the city to have the post office and customhouse located there.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, the Government will not accept title to property in a State unless exemption from the payment of taxes is conveyed by the State.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will say to the gentleman that the existence in a city of a piece of property owned by the National Government is dependent upon the exemption of that property from taxation by the city or State in which it is located.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. The State government can not tax a national security; otherwise it would ruin the Government's opportunity to borrow money; and, of course, it can not tax Government property, because the power to tax would prevent the Government from erecting a building in a city if it was left to the arbitrary discretion of a State to tax the national property.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will say in reply to the gentleman that I understand it is the policy of the Government that whenever they purchase a site for a post office or a public building they require that it shall be with the understanding that the National Government shall not pay a tax on the property.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Wisconsin stated that the taxation of a public building would result in the prevention of the building of these structures. If the taxing of a public building would have that effect, would not the same effect be likely to follow the taxing of private buildings?

Mr. FESS. No; they are different.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not think the gentleman from Wisconsin really intended the shade of meaning which the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. BAILEY. If that is the right inference——

Mr. OGLESBY. Of course, in one sense if one were true then the other would be; but I do not think the gentleman intended that shade of meaning.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that in every case where a Government building is built in any city it is a prerequisite, before they will erect a building or put any of the money of the Government into it, that all jurisdiction of the State is withdrawn from the land acquired by the Government, so that the State has neither the right nor the power to tax it in any sense? Is not that true?

Mr. OGLESBY. I just stated that the Government acquired property for the purpose of erecting Federal buildings in cities only on condition that that property be exempt from local taxation.

Mr. TOWNER. And is it not further true that they will not even pay for the curbing, or for the paving of the streets adjacent to it, or any part of the improvements of the street itself near to it?

Mr. MADDEN. That is true.

Mr. OGLESBY. That is true to this extent: The Government will, after the building is completed, build its own sidewalks and curbing around the building; but it will not submit to have the sidewalk and curb built by the local authorities and then an assessment levied against the Government to recoup the city for that expense.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is entirely correct about that.

Mr. BALTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OGLESBY. Yes.

Mr. BALTZ. Are the people in your State taxed for the purpose of maintaining the capital city of your State?

Mr. OGLESBY. Why, unquestionably. But I say there is no analogy between the location of the capital in a State and the location of the National Capital here.

Mr. BORCHERS. I was just prepared to ask the gentleman the same question. I do not think the gentleman understood the question. Do you know that I represent a farming district?

Mr. OGLESBY. I thought the gentleman represented the great city of Decatur.

Mr. BORCHERS. We are interested in our county seat and in our State capital. Is it not just as reasonable to tax the farmers of my district to make the county seat more beautiful and to make the State capital more beautiful as it is to tax them to make the city of Washington more beautiful?

Mr. OGLESBY. I will say in reply to the gentleman that I do not believe we should put it on the basis of making the capital more beautiful at all. That has nothing in the world to do with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed at the conclusion of the gentleman's five minutes.

Mr. CROSSER. Reserving the right to object, I should like 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then I will ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed——

Mr. MADDEN. On the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. On the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. PROUTY. Reserving the right to object, I did not quite understand the request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed upon the bill and amendments in 15 minutes after the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY] concludes his present 5 minutes; 5 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] and 10 minutes by us.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman what will be the effect on the rest of the bill if the committee should adopt neither the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky nor the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER]? Does that mean that the rest of the bill will be stricken out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If either the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] or the amendment offered by myself to the substitute is adopted, in my opinion that will conclude the matter.

Mr. CROSSER. Supposing neither is adopted?

Mr. MANN. Would that mean that as the bill is read the rest of it would be stricken out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. Probably without much further debate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has two other bills. Does he intend to call them up?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would be glad to call up either, if we can get through with this.

Mr. OGLESBY. If you get through with this right away?

Mr. MANN. I wondered whether it was the intention to adjourn any earlier than usual to-day, because of what is occurring to-day in New York.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no desire to keep the House at all.

Mr. MANN. I have no desire to interfere with the gentleman's program.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This debate has been going on for three District days, and it ought to be concluded. I will ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the bill and amendments cease in 25 minutes, 5 minutes to be used by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY], 10 minutes by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. CROSSER. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that if by any possibility both the substitute and the amendment are lost, then we will be in this situation: That the greater part of the original bill has not been read yet, and it could not be debated.

Mr. MANN. The bill has to be read anyhow.

Mr. CROSSER. I know; but we would not be allowed to debate the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is in error about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment——

Mr. MANN. Debate upon this section and all amendments thereto, I take it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The amendment is in lieu of the substitute.

Mr. MANN. Section 1 of the bill has been read, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] offered a substitute, saying that if it was agreed to he would move to strike out the other sections of the bill. The gentleman from Kentucky has offered an amendment to the substitute, so that the debate should be closed on the section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that debate on the section and amendment thereto close in 25 minutes, 10 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER], and 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY].

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. What is the program for the rest of the afternoon after this bill is disposed of?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not believe that we will have any time after this bill is disposed of.

Mr. FALCONER. Was it the intention of the gentleman to bring up any more District bills after this?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think not. It was my intention earlier in the day to do so, but I think that opportunity is gone.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the Committee on Rules has a rule ready, which I believe the chairman wants to call up after this is disposed of, relating to a bill of great importance, but which will not take much time in discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, there is no analogy between the location of the capital of a State and the National Capital. Almost every city in every State is anxious to have the State's capital located there. The capitol building and the executive mansion is practically all there is to it. Here the National Capital was located and here the great buildings of the Government are located because the Capital is here. The United States Government owns a great deal of property and transacts a great deal of business. There are many departments which have buildings here. The National Government gets the benefit of the money expended in building, cleaning, and repairing the streets and sidewalks, for removal of snow, and for the water department. I have here the bill making appropriations for the District. I see no reason in the world why the National Government should not pay its share toward maintaining the street-cleaning department, the improvements under the assessment and repair work, grading of streets and alleys and roadways, many of which are in front of Government-owned property, the repairs to streets and alleyways, the street cleaning, the snow removal, disposal of city refuse, the care and maintenance of parks, the lighting system, the aqueduct, the Metropolitan police. I hear gentlemen say that the Metropolitan police do not come inside of the building, because we have our own police. That is so, but it is on a parity with the business house down town that has its private watchman. It is for the general protection of Government property here in Washington, of which it has several hundred million dollars' worth.

It has the protection of the fire department and the benefit of all permanent improvements. I say, then, that whatever share the Government pays for the maintenance of these departments is nothing but justice. It is not a question of charity; it is a question of saying to the people how much you shall pay as a fair share. It is absurd to base the tax rate upon the rate in other cities. The question is, how much are the requirements, and then divide it fairly between the people here in the District and the Government of the United States, which owns the rest of the property.

I do not know any reason why the people of the District of Columbia should ask for charity, and I do not know why the people of the United States should ask for charity of the people of the District of Columbia. But the most monstrous proposition of all is, irrespective of what the amount of taxes raised are, they say you must arbitrarily pay a rate of 15 mills based on a full assessed valuation. I want to say that in my opinion that would produce a surplus.

Now, I pay a tax in three of the cities shown on that chart. I believe the tax rate based on actual valuation in the District of Columbia is as high as it is in either of those three cities. After careful examination of some of the assessments which are based on the valuation of my own property and the taxes which I pay, I am convinced that if you assess property here at 100 cents on the dollar and fix the rate at 15 mills you will raise more in taxation than the entire expenses of the District of Columbia would require. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the details of this bill, but I want to make a few observations. My judgment is that no mortal man has ever yet arisen who was capable of drafting entirely equitable revenue laws. Every one I have ever had occasion to examine discriminates in its provisions, and the discrimination is always against the poor and always in favor of the rich. The nearest approach to equity would be to assess all property at its actual value, if such a thing is possible. In doing that some one will say that the poor man or the poor woman is taxed too high. If all values are raised to the full market value, the rate of taxation could be lowered correspondingly and yet raise a given sum of money. The greatest disparity with reference to real estate, and especially homes, is against the poor, because the mighty mansions you have heard talked about to-day, those that drivers announce through their horns to every visitor to the city as the home of some millionaire, those values are more favored in assessment at any figure less than actual value than the humble home.

When it comes to personal property there can be no question that the burden is on the poor. Necessarily all household property can not be examined by the assessors, an inspection can not be had of each particular chair and bedstead and its actual value ascertained; neither can the horses owned by the drayman all be valued at actual value. Hence there must be a rule of equalization, and the rule always works so that they equalize the value on the bobtailed horse driven by the millionaire down, while the knock-kneed mule driven by the poor devil who works for his bread and meat is equalized up.

I am in favor of a rigid rule in this District requiring those who own wealth to pay reasonable taxes. If I had no judgment in the matter whatever, what I have read in the Washington papers—conditions which I believe to be true—would force me to a conclusion. I read in the papers of this city some time ago that rich men, bankers' associations, commercial clubs, business men's leagues, and the Lord knows what, have met in solemn convention in mass meeting and denounced the efforts of Congress to make them pay reasonable taxes. I have read where a distinguished man, a distinguished school-teacher—they think they know everything, and some of them do know most everything—said that this is a residential city and not a business city, and he wanted to cry down taxes, lower taxes, in order to invite and induce the owners of great wealth of this country to come here and to reason with the rich that to do so would enable them to escape taxation. When rich men from the States come here and fix their abode, their personal property follows them and thereby would escape taxation if the wealth of this city is allowed to control legislation. They argued that, "We want to offer as an inducement to rich men everywhere to come here the fact that their personal property which follows them will here escape taxation." This argument was made by those who, no doubt, clip coupons from bonds and from mortgages on the homes of thousands of people in the United States. Following that in solemn meeting they proclaimed to the world that if we adopt a law in Congress by which we attempt to make them pay taxes on the intangible wealth owned by them, which amounts to a fabulous sum, that men would refuse to do so, and they said that they would perjure themselves before they would do it. Mr. Chairman, the best thing on earth is to try them, pass the law taxing intangible wealth, and then if the rich man swears falsely as to his property for the purpose of escaping just taxation, treat him or them as you would other criminals in the District, and put him or them behind the bars, if need be, that justice may be done to struggling humanity, even here in the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, one gentleman has very truthfully said this afternoon that 90 per cent of all of the discussion that has been had upon this subject, or in the time allotted for the discussion of this subject, has been immaterial and irrelevant to the real issue involved. A great deal of time has been spent here to show that the old organic act was a good thing, and it ought not to be repealed or affected. I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], as a lawyer, that this bill, as now proposed, in any one of the three different propositions pending before this House, does not change the organic act one whit.

Mr. MADDEN. It simply puts it out of business.

Mr. PROUTY. It does not change the organic act on the statute books.

Mr. FESS. But it makes a great difference in the pocketbooks of the taxpayers.

Mr. PROUTY. Ah, that is correct. It makes a difference in the pocketbooks of the fellows who have successfully evaded the organic act. Now, let us see what the organic act provided. It provided that all kinds of property, real, personal, tangible, and intangible, should be assessed at 15 mills on the dollar. The commission appointed by Congress to look into that, after four years, decided that 15 mills was the fair average rate in the cities of the United States, and wanting to be fair to Washington, they fixed it at 15 mills. Since that time taxation has generally gone up all over the country until I have shown here by an undisputed table that it has been raised to 19 mills on the dollar.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say "undisputed table"?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; I say "undisputed," because that table and those figures have been before this House and have been before the United States now for four weeks, and no man, either in the public press or by private communication, has called into question a single one of the figures.

Mr. MADDEN. I have heard it questioned on the floor of the House.

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, yes, in an insinuating way; but no man has said that those figures are wrong.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has not proved the figures himself.

Mr. MANN. I think every gentleman here who has spoken said that they were wrong about his own city as to valuation.

Mr. PROUTY. It does not purport to say a word about valuation.

Mr. MANN. It purports to give the rate on full value.

Mr. PROUTY. And there is not a city but where the law provides exactly the rate at which it shall be fixed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman assumes——

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, I propose to reserve the right to talk or else have a question asked.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I am very glad that we gave the extra 10 minutes after his having talked for 4 or 5 hours the other day.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I understand the gentleman to say that this has not anything to do with the repeal of the organic act.

Mr. PROUTY. I did not say—I said it did not repeal a single word or syllable of the organic act.

Mr. FESS. Am I mistaken when I conclude that the gentleman's argument is that his method of taxation will make it unnecessary ultimately for the Government to pay anything for the District?

Mr. PROUTY. That is a question of conclusion. Here is all this bill does: All that this bill does is to say that real estate shall be assessed in the District of Columbia at its full value—just what the organic act says. It says that it shall be assessed at 15 mills on the dollar, or at a dollar and a half on the hundred—just what the organic act said. Let us get down to facts, so that we will understand each other. The trouble is this: In 1902 Congress, realizing, or some fellows who were manipulating the thing realizing, that they were going to raise too much revenue by that kind of a game to make it necessary for the Federal Government to pay anything, changed the ratio. They first said that real estate should be assessed at only two-thirds of its value. They put jewels and that class of property on the free list. They fixed it so that the moneys and credits invested here in what we call public utilities should be assessed at an extremely low rate, and they have drifted down the value of the property, while the Government end of it has remained the same—15 mills on the dollar. That has not been changed at any time.

Mr. OGLESBY. What are you going to do with the half the Government is supposed to pay?

Mr. FESS. I have not heard what the Government is going to pay under the gentleman's plan.

Mr. PROUTY. How do I know? I am not going to assess this property. All I am saying is that it shall be assessed at its full value, just as these other cities pay under their laws. I am going to say they shall pay 15 mills on the dollar, while in my city they say that the rate shall be 22 mills.

Mr. FESS. Is not this the gentleman's argument: That a 100 per cent valuation at a rate of 1½ will make it unnecessary for the Government to pay anything to the District?

Mr. PROUTY. I think it will, but that is purely a conclusion.

Mr. FESS. That is exactly what I thought.

Mr. PROUTY. Take, for instance, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who made a great deal of fuss about the value of real estate as shown by this George report. I was rather amused at the gentleman. He had just stood up here and denounced statements in the newspapers, and I call his attention to the fact that the very place and the only place he ever got Mr. Brown's name was from the newspaper report. Mr. Brown did not prepare it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not stating the fact.

Mr. PROUTY. Then where did he get it?

Mr. MANN. I got it from the gentleman himself.

Mr. PROUTY. I got it from the newspapers.

Mr. MANN. I do not know where the gentleman got his information, but I got it from the gentleman himself.

Mr. PROUTY. It is true this man Brown was an accountant.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman forgets what he states sometimes.

Mr. PROUTY. I do not forget what I state, but I sometimes forget what the gentleman states.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman does.

Mr. PROUTY. This man Brown, I do not even know him, except I was asked the question here as to who did this figuring, and I was told it was a man by the name of Brown, but there is a committee of 15 Members of this House that was appointed for that purpose. However, this is irrelevant; it does not make any difference whether that is $744,000,000 or $350,000,000, they will only be assessed hereafter at 15 mills on the dollar. Now, that is all this bill will do. Even if the figures are incorrect, what difference does it make?

Mr. OGLESBY. It relieves the Government from paying any part of the expense of administering the affairs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PROUTY. It does not excuse anybody. This is what it does, what the gentleman stated several times in his speech he was in favor of, and that is to make the people of the District of Columbia pay a fair rate of taxation as compared with the other people of the United States.

Mr. OGLESBY. I did not say that; I said they should pay their fair share of the burden of the administration of the affairs of the District.

Mr. PROUTY. Well, a fair share—that is begging the whole question. Nobody knows what is the fair share. They say the Government owns two-fifths, and the Government reports show they own 127⅛ in 7,114 acres in the city.

Mr. OGLESBY. But the gentleman does not suggest what the proportion is; if so, we may stand by it.

Mr. PROUTY. I have given it in my speech, and if the gentleman will read a good speech I think he will find it.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman's fair share is all of it?

Mr. PROUTY. My thought is this, gentlemen: Some of you think I am antagonizing somebody, wanting to fight somebody, wanting to fight this District. Why, bless your soul, as far as I know I have not a single enemy in the District, and so far as I know I have not a single friend in the State of New York, except my distinguished friend before me. Why should I fight the District of Columbia? I was simply your representative put upon the Committee on the District of Columbia to investigate the relations between this Government and the District of Columbia, and I found what I believed to be a burning wrong; a wrong, for instance, that is causing the people in Alexandria, who pay 18 mills on the dollar to educate their children and build their sidewalks and build their pavements, to help pay the taxes of these people over here who pay 10 mills on the dollar, and I can not get it out of me why that is not wrong. When you get it in the concrete you have covered the whole Nation. There is not a city there that does not pay more than they do here. Why should those people be called upon to come here and educate these people, to build their sidewalks, to build their pavements, to flush their streets? I agree with all that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said about this being a beautiful city. I want it to be a beautiful city, but that does not mean I am going to do a wrong, a burning wrong, to 90,000,000 of the people of the United States in order to secure it? [Applause].

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think any of those 90,000,000 are lying awake at nights thinking we are going to take anything away from them?

Mr. PROUTY. No; I am simply saying that, being accustomed to a certain species of graft, they simply lie dormant under it, and that is God's truth. [Applause.] I will tell you if the people of the United States knew just exactly the situation that is here in Washington, they would not be silent long, even in their stupified condition. Why, the gentleman stands up here any says he does not object to giving 7 cents. I would like to ask the gentleman why he would not be willing to make it 14 cents while he is at it? If he will just make it 14 cents, that would not hurt anybody. It is a mean, dirty little man who will not give 14 cents, and yet if we give 14 cents apiece you could have a city here that the millionaires living on Massachusetts Avenue, without paying a cent of it, could live like they did in the holy city of China—in palaces—while the people all over the realm, the poor people, living in huts, paid the taxes to support those people in their luxury.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the gentleman tell me whether or not the committee made an effort to ascertain the proportionate value of the property owned by the Government to that owned by private citizens in the District?

Mr. PROUTY. No; we did not; of course not; because we were not trying to assess it. What we did try to do was this, and that is to do something that was fair between the people who own property here and live under the benign influence of this Capital as compared with that portion who live elsewhere. We stated this fundamental proposition: Before the people of Washington have a right to call upon the people all over the United States to contribute to their support they must at least bear as heavy a burden as these other men whom they have asked to contribute.

Mr. OGLESBY. The gentleman draws his conclusions, but did the committee attempt to ascertain the facts?

Mr. PROUTY. I said "no" to that long ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] if I can at this time.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, the thought that has impressed itself upon me during this debate is that we are going back to the Dark Ages of taxation. The thing which, the world over, is generally being abandoned, or is thought of as being abandoned, is to-day being championed here on this floor. I hold in my hand an advertisement of one of the most prosperous cities in the great Southwest, a city that is advertising the fact that it is getting away from this barbaric system. The city of Houston, Tex., is sending broadcast the following advertisement:

A perpetual bonus to manufacturers and merchants is offered by the city of Houston, Tex., through its system of exemptions from taxation.

Personal property, such as cash, household furniture, and evidences of debt, are totally exempt from taxation.

THE HOUSTON PLAN OF TAXATION

contemplates that merchandise, machinery of manufactories, and all other improvements upon land shall be assessed at only 25 per cent of their value, land being assessed as its fair value.

Take your money and brains to Houston, Tex., and get the full benefit of all that you create by your industry and enterprise.

For further information, address J. J. Pastoriza, finance and tax commissioner, Houston, Tex.

Now, Houston has been growing in a most amazing way, according to all the testimony which I have been able to gather, including that of Mayor Campbell, and there is to-day on the part of the people of that city, so far as I can ascertain, absolutely no challenge of the merits of this system.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that the success of the Houston plan has been attested by the mayor of that city. His own words, reported in the Houston Chronicle, may appropriately be quoted. He says that all taxpayers in Houston have been faring alike, and he adds:

Under our present system of taxation Houston has prospered like it has done never before. We have accomplished a great deal under our new form of taxation.

One of the best features of the Houston plan is that it is no longer necessary for people to commit perjury when making their assessments. Men can be gentlemen now when they do their assessing. It is no longer necessary for people to send their money to New York the last of December and have it sent here January 15 in order to keep from paying taxes on their money.

Under the present system there is no discrimination whatever. The man who owns land pays the same as other landowners. The man who owns property pays the same as other property owners. Everybody fares alike, and I can see no just cause why some of the taxpayers in Houston should have a kick coming.

It is my observation that some of those who are behind this new movement, trying to stir up trouble, have done little for the upbuilding of Houston, although many of them have been in a position to do so.

There are some who wish to be parasites on the community and to get rich from the industry of others. These men who have purchased in Houston at extremely low figures in the past and who are now holding it for purely speculative purposes, without improving it, do nothing for the advancement of Houston.

Much has been said on this floor during the debate on this bill about Washington having become a haven of refuge for tax dodgers. This is a confession from the other side absolutely fatal to their case. They confirm by their declaration the simple fact that men instinctively flee from injustice; that instinctively they seek to protect their property and to enjoy the fruits of their labor; and that instinctively they gather where the greatest freedom from destructive, respressive, and punitive taxation is to be found. Washington is not made worse by the coming hither of people of wealth. It is made better, at least to the extent that these people of wealth build and beautify and contribute to the progress of the National Capital. Why should we wish to drive them out? Is wealth indeed so objectionable?

Houston does not think so. She is inviting wealth. She is bidding strong for men of wealth and enterprise to settle there and to take part in her civic and industrial life. She thinks that wealth is a good thing, and that too much of it can not be brought into her banks and her businesses and her homes. She thinks houses are good things, and she lays no punitive hand on the improver. Rather, it is the nonimprover whom she seeks to discourage.

Nor is Houston alone in possession of this sane idea. We find it cropping out in many other cities, notably in some of those of the Canadian west. Take Victoria, in British Columbia, for example. We find that Victoria is advertising pretty much along the lines followed by the Texan city. Here is an advertisement widely circulated by one of the leading banking institutions of that progressive community. The advertisement itself is striking and significant, but more striking and significant is the fact that it comes from so conservative a source as a $3,000,000 trust company, which is spending money to tell the world that Victoria is a city where industry and enterprise are not penalized as we would penalize them here in Washington under the terms of this bill or as demanded by many of the gentlemen who have spoken in its support. But let me allow the Victoria bank advertisement to speak and tell its own story. Listen:

WESTERN CANADA IS TO-DAY THE MOST PROSPEROUS COUNTRY ON EARTH.

This is partly due to enormous natural resources just being developed, to the immense sums being spent on railroad construction, and in and near Victoria to what Rudyard Kipling says is "the finest climate on earth," but is also very largely due to common sense in tax laws and the immigration these induce. The partial application of Henry George's single-tax ideas in Victoria and Vancouver worked so well that every town, every city, and every Province in western Canada is working for their full adoption.

Here it is no longer a greater crime to build a chicken house than to rob one, as it is in every county of every one of the United States.

Men are not punished for building homes, stores, or factories or for raising crops or cows. Homes, factories, cattle, and all personal property are exempt, and taxes are levied on land values and natural resources.

This tends to prevent monopoly and to increase wages, profits, and interest.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not the voice of the doctrinaire reformer. It is not the vaporing of an irresponsible theorist. It is not the heated fancy of some rampant radical bent on change. It is the sober pronouncement of a great financial institution, which is concerned in acquainting the world with a most important economic fact—the fact that industry in that community is held in favor and is subjected to neither pain nor penalty.

The logic of the Johnson-Prouty proposition is the logic of the middle ages. It harks back to a remote past. It flies in the face of the best thought of the day on taxation. In my own great State of Pennsylvania we are steadily drawing away from the idea which lies at the basis of the Johnson-Prouty scheme. For 40 years we have practically exempted personal property from taxation. Manufacturing has been wholly free from taxes, and as a result Pennsylvania manufactures have grown in greater proportion than manufactures in any other State. Nor is this all. By recent legislation we have provided for a progressive exemption of improvements on land from taxation in cities of the second class. That cities of other classes will speedily demand the same advantage is certain. They must demand it or fall behind in the race. Improvements will be made, other things being equal, where they are accorded the best treatment; capital will go for investment to the point where it finds the warmest welcome and the least disposition to lay it under tribute.

Gentlemen have bewailed the fact that the taxation of intangible personal property is not accomplished with that precision which they fancy to be so much to be desired. But, Mr. Chairman, is it not about time that we should begin to ask ourselves whether a thing we have been trying for 2,000 years to do, only always to fail, is something we really ought not to do? Most people long ago ceased trying to mix oil and water. The alchemist who sought to transmute the baser metals into gold has moldered in the grave for centuries. And no one seriously tries any longer to lift himself over the fence by his bootstraps. But honest and well-meaning gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere still believe it possible to devise an equitable and a workable system of taxing intangible personal property, this in the face of universal experience and in spite of the testimony of all authorities on the subject. Personal property, tangible and intangible, largely escapes taxation, no matter how rigid the system, because man naturally and instinctively rebels against it. He perjures himself rather than submit to it. He hides what belongs to him rather than allow it to be taken away from him in part by the community which had no part in producing it.

I might quote volumes to show the utter futility of all efforts to tax personal property on anything like an equitable basis or with anything approximating fairness. And the worst of it is that where personal property taxation is most successfully carried on there the greatest injustice is done. It is best when it is least effectively applied.

It has been my privilege, Mr. Chairman, to introduce a bill in this House the adoption of which I feel sure would mark a long step in the right direction. It is in part an adaptation of the Houston plan, or perhaps I might better say it is an attempt to combine what is known as the Houston plan with the so-called Pittsburgh plan with certain features peculiar to itself. Under it we should have a progressive exemption of improvements from taxation for a period of years, with an account taken of the annual depreciation, the bill further providing for exemptions of a sweeping and most salutary character in conformity with the best modern experience. My bill follows in detail:

A bill (H. R. 14384) to regulate the assessment of property for taxation in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter in the assessment of property in the District of Columbia the value of improvements in, on, or under the land shall be set forth by the assessors in a column in the assessment rolls separate from the value of the land: Provided, That beginning with the year 1915 an annual charge of 5 per cent for depreciation shall be made against all improvements in said District, this amount to be deducted from the assessed value of such property: Provided further, That in addition to the amount charged off for depreciation there shall annually be a further reduction of 10 per cent for a period of five years in the total assessment against improvements, so that at the end of that period improvements in no case shall be assessed at more than 50 per cent of their value: And provided further, That hereinafter personal property, including household goods, merchandise, money in bank, stocks, notes, bonds, mortgages and other evidences of debt, jewelry, horses and other domestic animals, carriages, automobiles, books, machinery, implements, tools, office fixtures and furniture, boats, tugs and other vessels, locomotives, cars, wagons, carts, drays and like vehicles, shall be wholly exempt from taxation, but it is expressly provided that the value of all franchises shall be considered and treated as land values and assessed on the same basis as other land values for purposes of taxation.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill could be substituted for the one now pending, I feel certain that the results would be little less than magical. We should see a response in the way of improvements such as that made to the exemptions provided by Houston, Vancouver, Victoria, and other cities which have ceased levying heavy fines on the improver. I want to see this Capital grow into one of beauty in every section, not in beauty here and there but everywhere—in the alleys as in the avenues, in the humbler quarters as in the regions of wealth and luxury. I want to see it "a city set on a hill" to light the way of other cities of the land and of the world to higher things. And this we should surely do were we here and now to try out the experiment of appropriating public values for public purposes, while leaving private values to the free and full enjoyment of those to whom they belong.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of repeating some things which I said before, I am going to occupy seven or eight minutes.

There is one thing on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] and myself heartily agree, and that is that this discussion has gone entirely outside of the range of the question involved in this bill. As I said on two former occasions when I occupied this floor, the real purpose and the only purpose of this bill is and has been to establish a plan whereby we can get a full valuation assessment of the real estate, let the tax rate be what it may. But we have heard everything under the sun discussed except that very plain, simple proposition to which every reasonable and fair man can agree. The only reason for this bill being here at all is the fact that some property has been taxed on half its value, some on a third, and some on two-thirds, thereby doing a great injustice among the citizens of the District of Columbia; and yet because that proposition was so manifestly fair, so simple that anybody could see that it would pass the House, these gentlemen have seized upon that as a vehicle wherewith to carry their repeal of the half-and-half system into operation.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. How can you fix an equitable basis for the taxation of real estate unless you know how much you want to raise and who is going to pay it?

Mr. CROSSER. You can fix an equitable assessment. You mean a tax rate, do you not?

Mr. FESS. Yes; a tax rate.

Mr. CROSSER. You must know——

Mr. FESS. My point was that you certainly have in mind whether the District is to pay it all or whether the Federal Government is to pay a part of it.

Mr. CROSSER. I was going to come to that. Mr. GEORGE'S original bill, which is represented by the amendment which I have pending before the House, is so framed as to avoid this whole controversy as to the half-and-half system. The language is such that, whether the District is to pay two-thirds, a half, or a quarter, it will always apply, because it simply says whatever the District is to raise it shall be raised by a rate determined and levied by the District Commissioners.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CROSSER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the language in that respect:

Shall be sufficient to pay the portion to be borne.

That is all it says. We do not care whether it is half or two-thirds or all of it.

Mr. FESS. Who will fix the portion?

Mr. CROSSER. The District Commissioners shall fix a rate sufficient to pay the portion. Do you not see? Now, their bill, on the other hand, proposes to fix it rigidly by statute, a thing which is absolutely out of the question, in my opinion.

Mr. FESS. I like your plan better.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if I understood him. Did he say that his amendment was exactly like the original bill? Is that it?

Mr. CROSSER. I think so; with perhaps some verbal changes that we thought wise.

Mr. TOWNER. It is substantially the same?

Mr. CROSSER. Substantially the same.

Mr. PROUTY. Under the original bill was personal property and real estate assessed at the same rate?

Mr. CROSSER. We did not mention personal property at all in the original bill.

Mr. PROUTY. You leave it at 15 mills by putting this on the graduated scale.

Mr. CROSSER. The idea was to do the same thing with personal property later.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CROSSER. I can not yield more. I must get through with this.

I have heard Members here say: "Let us dispose of this whole thing without further discussion; we do not want this further discussed at all; we do not want any change." I think that is absolutely a mistaken view to take of the matter. Here is one thing which every reasonable man must agree to—to devise a plan which will provide an equitable assessment, so as to tax everybody in proportion to the true value of his real estate. If we should take the advice of some men, we would throw it all out of the window, because some gentlemen have succeeded in confusing the matter. If we take the George bill, which is represented by the amendment I have introduced here to the Johnson-Prouty bill, it is as simple as the rule of three. We say 12 assessors instead of 3, because we found that 3 were simply guessing at it. Now, what is hard about that, pray tell? Nothing that I can see. But here was the opportunity to slip in through this confusion what amounted to a repeal of this half-and-half law, a thing that they were afraid to come out with as a straight issue—the adjustment of the relations between the District of Columbia and the National Government. And so we have the irrelevant discussion which has resulted in this confusion. If it is kept clearly in mind that this is not a tax measure, but only a measure providing for assessment or valuation of property for taxation, the whole difficulty is solved and the confusion is removed.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. Under the Prouty amendment is it not a fact that revenue would be raised without regard to whether the District had need for the revenue thus raised or not?

Mr. CROSSER. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. GORMAN. Just one question more. Under the substitute which you have proposed is it not also true that as much revenue could be raised under your substitute as is raised under the Prouty amendment, with this exception, that the rate may be fixed or so regulated as not to gather any more revenue than the District may need?

Mr. CROSSER. Nor less. That is exactly correct. In other words, we provide machinery whereby they can procure exactly the amount of revenue the law and needs of the District require them to collect; or, in other words, enough to pay their share of the District's expense.

Mr. PROUTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSSER. I can not yield now. I have some other things which I wish to say.

Mr. PROUTY. Just one question.

Mr. CROSSER. If it is short.

Mr. PROUTY. Under your system, if your figures are correct, it will only be necessary to levy 6½?

Mr. CROSSER. I do not care what it is. If the Members of Congress are dissatisfied with the arrangement between the two Governments, let them proceed to amend the law which provides the amount each Government is to pay. That is an easy matter. Here is a bill, now, pending before the Congress, H. R. 9417, reported from the committee on December 17, in which this is specifically provided for. I will read the language—

That all acts and parts of acts, to the extent that they commit the United States to contribute one-half, or any other portion, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

If you wanted to destroy this great monster, about which you have pleaded so tearfully, there was and is your chance.

Mr. PROUTY. Why do not you do it?

Mr. CROSSER. You waited long months until we had gotten this bill up, which has nothing to do with anything except the assessment of real estate for taxation, and then you put that bill, as a rider, on a measure that has nothing to do with it. That is the truth about it.

So, gentlemen, I urge you to stop and think what the real purpose of the original George bill is. Every one of you will vote for it if you do. It is as simple as it possibly can be. It is simply to provide for a full valuation of the real estate, not to change the arrangement between the United States Government and the District government, but to make equitable and fair assessment, and thereby distribute justly the burden of taxation among the different citizens of the District of Columbia in proportion to the value of their property. Then if you want to change the arrangement between the National Government and the District government, it will be a simple thing. Nobody is going to complain about it. I will vote for a change in arrangement; but let us legislate upon one thing at a time.

Mr. OGLESBY. Has the committee made any effort to ascertain that proportion?

Mr. CROSSER. No; we made no effort. As soon as it was proposed to inject this question into the bill we found ourselves with all kinds of differences of opinion and all kinds of confusion. One gentleman was talking about taxing intangible property at one rate, and another gentleman was talking about taxing it at another rate. The fact is that this is not a bill to arrange a system of taxation, but is a bill to provide a method and means for assessing property or ascertaining its true value.

Mr. OGLESBY. Your view is that the committee should make an examination and ascertain a fair proportion, whatever it is, and put it into a law?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; and make a fair proportion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman the purpose of his inquiries as to getting information upon which to vote or not to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given a little more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. CROSSER, proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MANN. Three days have been spent on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. IGOE. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 30.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. CROSSER. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky and Mr. CROSSER to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 35.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote the ayes are 37 and the noes are 35, and the amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The question is now on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did the Chair announce the result of the last vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced the result of the last vote. The question is on agreeing to the substitute as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. IGOE. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 32.

Mr. MANN and Mr. IGOE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky and Mr. CROSSER to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 31.

So the substitute as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

TUESDAY, May 12, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou dost teach us the higher unity of life by the very sacrifices that we are called upon to make for the public good. Thou hast brought us into a blessed brotherhood. Thou dost make much of the blessing of life depend upon the spirit with which we mingle with our fellow men. Thou hast placed many things before us which are more to be prized than life itself. Honor and truth and freedom are far more valuable than any human life. We thank Thee that the high aspirations Thou hast created within us point us to something beyond the mere life which we live. The promise which is voiced by our own heart's desire for life abundant and for freedom eternal is the prophecy of its fulfillment hereafter. Bless us this day in the discharge of its duties. May we live up to the high privilege of the sons of God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, when the Panama Canal tolls bill was under consideration by the committee to which it was referred some testimony was given to the effect that ocean freights are fixed by combinations or conferences so general in their character that they are participated in even by the Panama Railroad Co., and that the freight rates of the ships of that company are fixed as a result of such conferences so participated in by its officers. The United States Government is prosecuting a suit at this time against various ship companies, charging them with a violation of the law in connection with such conferences. The charge so made before the committee practically amounts to an accusation that the officers of the Panama Railroad Co. are participating in the unlawful acts against which the efforts of the Government are so directed.

A resolution was adopted by the committee requesting that the secretary of the committee communicate with the manager of the company and ask a statement from him in relation to the matter.

Likewise a question arose as to the proportion of the carrying capacity of line steamers ordinarily occupied by the cargoes they carry. The resolution also directed that the manager of the company be requested to communicate the experience of the company in that regard.

At the request of the chairman of the committee, I addressed a communication to Mr. Drake, the manager of the company, and I have his answer to the inquiries thus addressed, which I send to the desk, with a request for unanimous consent that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

PANAMA RAILROAD CO.,
2½ State Street, New York, May 7, 1914.

Hon. T. J. WALSH,
Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United State Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, addressed to our vice president, who is absent from the office for a few days, and thank you for giving us an opportunity to furnish the facts in connection with the various statements that have been made from time to time that our company belongs to or is represented in "conferences," and that its rates are fixed by the action of such conference meetings.

In these statements reference has been made to the European conference and to the New York conference. The European conference is known as the "conference of West India Atlantic steamship companies," and is composed of steamship lines operating between Europe and Colon and Puerto Mexico, where they connect with our company and the Tehuantepec Railroad, respectively, on traffic to and from ports of South America, Central America, Mexico, and the United States.

We understand that meetings of these conference lines are held in Europe from time to time, but the only one of which we have advice is that usually held either in June, July, or August of each year, at which our company, the Tehuantepec Railroad, the Guatemalan railroads, and the Pacific Ocean carriers of all these routes are invited to be represented for the purpose of deciding the conditions under which Central American and Mexican coffee destined to European ports is to be carried during the subsequent coffee season that begins in December.

This coffee traffic is carried under what is known as the "rebate-circular" plan, by which shippers or consignees are granted a rebate of 10 per cent on the tariff rate at the end of the season, provided they have restricted their shipments of coffee to the Panama, Tehuantepec, or Guatemalan routes, and since the time the United States secured control of our company we have not participated in this rebate, which is paid in full by our Atlantic and Pacific cocarriers. On the contrary, we have objected to the rebate principle and repeatedly notified our connections that while we would participate in any rates necessary to secure traffic against competitive routes, we would not be parties to any agreement or understanding giving shippers or consignees a rebate at the end of each season or at any other time.

We have not been and are not now members of the conference; have attended this one meeting each year in an advisory capacity for the purpose of objecting to the Atlantic lines, our Pacific cocarriers, and the representatives of competitive routes from taking steps which in our judgment might result in decreasing our traffic or diverting it to these competitive routes; and during such meetings have openly stated to these lines that if the conditions established by them and their Pacific carriers resulted in the diversion of traffic from our route, we would take any action we deemed necessary to prevent this, even to the extent of bringing European shipments via New York by our steamship line.

The New York conference was first brought to our attention in the latter part of 1909. This consisted of steamship lines interested in the Cuban, Venezuelan, and West Indian traffic, in which we were not concerned, and also in traffic to Colon. We understood that the object of this conference was to, if possible, establish uniform bills of lading, shipping receipts, due bills, and other shipping documents; to keep the various lines informed of the decisions rendered by the Government from time to time governing the transportation of dangerous, damaging, and inflammable cargo on passenger steamers; and generally to keep informed on all questions of shipping not connected in any way with the establishment of rates.

We were elected members of this conference, but declined to accept election, and we have not at any time participated or been represented at meetings where the question of raising or lowering rates was discussed or settled, nor have we been guided in the slightest degree by any action regarding rates, if such has been taken, by this or any other conference.

The rates from New York and those from Europe to points in Central America, Mexico, and South America are not fixed on the basis of the local rates of the Atlantic carrier, the railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, and the carrier on the Pacific Ocean, because a combination of "locals" would give a higher rate than the traffic would stand in competition with steamers sailing via the Straits of Magellan.

When our steamship line was the only carrier between New York and Colon the tariff then in effect was one that had been agreed to by the Atlantic carrier, the Panama Railroad, and the Pacific carrier. When other steamship lines from New York were granted through-billing privileges over the Panama Railroad upon exactly the same terms and conditions as our own steamship line, it was upon the basis of their maintaining the through tariffs to Central America, Mexico, and South America then in effect, and that changes therefrom could be made only by consent of all the initial carriers; otherwise these various lines would be competing with each other for this traffic at the expense of our company and the Pacific carrier.

The rates from the United States to Central America were for many years past higher than those from Europe via the direct lines running to Colon, although the route is some 1,300 miles shorter from this country. Since the Government assumed control of our company we have, under the authority given us as initial carriers, endeavored to have the rates from the United States established on at least as low a basis as those from Europe, and in this we have been successful, not because of any right we possess, but on account of the attitude we have consistently followed.

The rates from the United States to the west coast of South America have always been higher than those from Europe, but as a result of our efforts they were finally lowered to the European basis, notwithstanding the fact that the most important of these lines is controlled by a company largely interested in the traffic from Europe on the Atlantic Ocean.

On the local traffic between New York and the Canal Zone we have no understanding or agreement with any of the lines that run from Europe or from the United States. The basic rate of $8 per ton that was in effect between New York and Colon prior to the time the Government assumed control of our company was shortly thereafter reduced by us to $3.50, so as to enable the Government to have the material required in the construction of the canal carried at a low rate in its steamships of American registry. The other lines running to the Canal Zone, none of which operate steamers of American registry, can establish any rate they consider necessary, but it is not likely they will quote lower than the one we have established, because the principal complaint they have always made is that our rate should be advanced to the basis of rates charged by them to West Indian ports, some 600 miles nearer to New York than is the Canal Zone, ranging from $4.40 to $6 per ton.

CARGO CAPACITY OF STEAMERS.

Our steamships usually sail from New York either "down to their marks" or filled to their capacity.

The steamship Advance, of 1,650 tons net register and 2,605 tons gross, can not carry more than 1,950 tons.

The steamship Allianca, of 2,364 tons net register and 3,905 tons gross, is fully loaded with 2,500 tons.

The steamships Colon and Panama, of 4,193 tons net register and 5,667 tons gross, are fully loaded with 4,500 tons.

The Ancon and Cristobal, of 6,195 tons net register and 9,606 tons gross, are "down to their marks" with 11,200 tons.

The foreign colliers that we secure from the Earn Line Steamship Co. for the carriage of our coal from Norfolk and Newport News to Colon carry about two and one-half times their net registered tonnage; for instance, the steamship Clearpool, of 2,714 tons net register, left Norfolk with 6,354½ tons of Pocahontas coal and had 598½ tons in the bunkers. The steamship Tabor, of 2,392 tons net register, left Norfolk with 5,463½ tons of Pocahontas coal and 526 tons in the bunkers.

Our experience is that combined passenger and freight steamers such as the four first above mentioned are able to carry very little in excess of their net registered tonnage, because of the space that is required for the accommodation of passengers and crew and the supplies that must be carried. The Ancon and Cristobal were originally built as cargo steamers, and the small passenger accommodations with which they are now supplied were constructed after the vessels had been in service for some time. If these accommodations were removed and the crew proportionately reduced in number, we figure the vessels would carry from 1,000 to 1,300 tons more than at present.

We trust this satisfactorily answers the inquiries you have made, but we shall be glad to furnish any additional information that you require.

Yours, respectfully,

T. H. ROSSBOTTOM,
Assistant to Vice President.

MIGRATORY-BIRD LAW.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have received a number of telegrams in the nature of memorials from prominent citizens of Kansas, protesting against the proposed reduction in the appropriation in the Agricultural bill for the enforcement of the migratory-bird law. As the Senate knows, Secretary Houston has asked for $100,000 for the support and enforcement of this law. The appropriation was reduced to $50,000 by the House, and the Senate committee has further reduced it to only $10,000, which renders it practically inoperative. I should like to have the telegrams read.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas if he is aware of the fact that various departments of the Government have absolutely refused to test this law in the courts? There are responsible citizens who will plead guilty of having shot game contrary to the law and the regulations thereunder, and yet the departments of the Government have absolutely declined to bring suit. I will ask the Senator if he does not know further that there is not a respectable lawyer in the United States who believes that this law is constitutional, and, therefore, the waste of $100,000 would be more than ordinarily ridiculous?

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, in answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Missouri I will simply say that this is the first time in my knowledge of public affairs that I have ever heard that it was necessary for the Government which passed a law to prosecute an action to determine whether the law which was passed by Congress was constitutional. I have always understood that it was the right of any citizen under the law to test any law passed by Congress or by a State; but it is hardly within the province of the Government to institute a suit to try to discredit the action of the Congress itself, the lawmaking power. It is, as I have said, the right of every citizen to determine this question, and every court which has passed upon the law thus far has held it to be constitutional. No court has, at any rate, held it unconstitutional. The law is upon the statute books and is presumed to be constitutional. So long as it is the law it is our duty to see that it is enforced and to make a sufficient appropriation to enforce it. It is for the courts to determine its constitutionality.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas tell me how a citizen is to determine the constitutionality of this law if the Government will not make an arrest?

Mr. THOMPSON. There are already in the RECORD letters from the Secretary of Agriculture showing that there have been various prosecutions under this law and that men have been convicted and have stood the penalty. Evidently, in the minds of those who were prosecuted, the law was constitutional. They at least failed to take an appeal.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not like——

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas one further question while he has the floor. I will ask him if he does not know that every time any man has gone to his defense the suit has been dismissed?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; under the statement from the Secretary of Agriculture that is not correct. He states that they have all paid the penalty and have refused to prosecute an appeal. He also states that there is one case in Arkansas still pending. The defendant could no doubt test the law in this case if he desires to do so.

Mr. REED. Those are the ones who would not go to their defense. I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate that I have tendered to the Attorney General on three different occasions the name of a reputable man who desires to know whether or not this law is constitutional, and who represents a large body of men. I have been unable to get that man arrested. The information I have is that the officers are directed not to make arrests. I asked this to be done in order that Congress might know before the appropriation bill came up whether the law was a valid law, because, if it was a valid law, it was one thing to vote an appropriation to enforce it, and, if it was an invalid law, one that was certain to be stricken down, then, of course, the money ought not to be appropriated. But I have been unable to get the warrant issued, and I believe, from all the information I have, that neither the Secretary of Agriculture——

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. REED. Nor the Attorney General has the slightest idea that this law will stand the test of the courts.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask, What is the order before the Senate?

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to have the telegrams read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order seems to be a discussion of the migratory-bird law, which is not in order.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask if debate is in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the purpose for which I rose, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. THOMPSON. I made the request that the telegrams be read, and I do not understand that there was any objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thought the request of the Senator from Kansas was to have the telegrams printed in the RECORD. Is there any objection to reading the telegrams?

Mr. THOMAS. I object to the request that the telegrams be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, then, Shall the telegrams be read?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I object, to save time.

Mr. THOMPSON. A number of documents have been read here this morning. I desire to have the telegrams read which were sent by me to the desk; and if they are not read, I will read them myself at my first opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being an objection, the question is, Shall the telegrams be read? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it. The Secretary will read the telegrams.

The Secretary read the telegrams, as follows:

ATCHISON, KANS., May 2, 1914.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

Best citizens in northeastern Kansas stand for Weeks-McLean migratory-bird law. Farmers, sportsmen, out-of-door enthusiasts, and citizens in general believe it is important, and this section of Kansas has never opposed it. Your own observance have undoubtedly taught you that State laws are inadequate and that effective Federal control is only remedy that will save many species from extermination.

SHEFFIELD INGALLS,
Lieutenant Governor.

ATCHISON, KANS., May 4, 1914.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

Federal protection of migratory birds meets hearty approval of citizens in this community. Value of insectivorous birds to agricultural interests in Kansas is more important than the question of whether greedy hunters shall be permitted to murder mating wild fowl in spring of year. As a citizen of Kansas I indorse $100,000 appropriation for its effective enforcement.

W. J. BAILEY, Ex-Governor.

ATCHISON, KANS., May 4, 1914.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Sportsmen's Association, in Kansas City, claims several hundred members scattered through Middle West. This association was formed to fight Federal migratory law. There are more than a million and half of people in Kansas, and the bird destroyers, who are determined to nullify the law, number less than one in a thousand compared to those who indorse Federal protection. There is only one opinion in northeast and northern Kansas, and that is the law should be upheld and rigidly enforced. All sportsmen I have talked to are red-headed, and want one hundred thousand appropriation for enforcement. I think the people of Kansas should have say as to whether their robins and song birds should be slaughtered when winter drives them to Southern States.

T. A. MOXEY,
County Attorney, Atchison County.

VERMILLION, KANS., May 5, 1914.

W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Sentiment of Vermillion and northern Kansas strong for $100,000 appropriation enforcement Weeks-McLean law. Farmers, sportsmen, practically all citizens who are informed about law, indorse it. Behalf hundreds citizens respectfully urge you to give law fullest measure of support.

FOREST WARREN,
Editor Vermillion Times.

TOPEKA, KANS., May 8, 1914.

Senator THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

Bird lovers in Topeka, Kans., indorse $100,000 appropriation for Federal migratory law enforcement. An insignificant minority of game hogs should not be permitted to rule.

J. W. HOLLINGER.

TROY, KANS., May 4, 1914.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

Doniphan County sportsmen and bird enthusiasts most strongly favor appropriation for enforcement of Weeks-McLean law, Federal protection, as only agency to prevent utter destruction of our wild fowl and native birds. I believe wishes of majority of citizens in Kansas should be given more consideration than the unreasonable protests of selfish shooters, whose ideas of sport is to ruthlessly slay birds in mating season.

DR. R. S. DINSMORE.

WICHITA, KANS., May 4.

Senator THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

The farmers of the country will watch with interest your activities in behalf of the proposed $100,000 appropriation in connection with the Federal migratory-bird law. This will be your opportunity to demonstrate your interest in the agricultural development of the country by assisting in saving to it its bird life.

D. H. HARRISON.

ATCHISON, KANS., May 2.

W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Federal migratory-bird law immensely popular here, and many persons are alarmed because $50,000 appropriation for enforcement has been stricken out. If you can support appropriation, your action will receive hearty approval of bird lovers in this section.

JAMES W. ORR.

ATCHISON, KANS., May 2, 1914.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

As a sportsman who is in touch with game conditions in Kansas, I express the opinion that Federal protection of migratory birds is urgently needed, if the birds are to be saved from annihilation. I trust you will support $100,000 appropriation for its enforcement.

J. W. WAGGENER,
Superintendent Railway Light & Power Co.

ATCHISON, KANS., May 2, 1914.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Effort to hold up the $100,000 appropriation for enforcement of the Weeks-McLean law is, in my opinion, a part of a well-laid plan conceived by violators of that law, who have already laid themselves liable to prosecution. The law has the party indorsement of practically every good citizen in this vicinity, and any obstacle put in the way of its enforcement will be resented by them. I do not believe a single sportsman can be found among the men who are back of the effort to indirectly nullify this law. I have talked with many people on this subject, and all deplore the resistance that is being offered to the enforcement of the law; and I speak for them as well as myself when I ask you to use your best endeavor to see that the appropriation carries.

Z. E. JACKSON,
Superintendent of Park.

ATCHISON, KANS., May 1, 1914.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

Wild-life conservationists, sportsmen in northeastern Kansas, believe time has come to fight for square deal for our song and wild birds. Hundreds and hundreds of citizens in this locality are bitter over attempts to kill appropriation of $100,000 for Weeks-McLean law, and as citizens and not politicians they seek your aid. Sentiment here unanimous for appropriation, and, if it is not made, will consider it triumph of greedy, merciless game hunters who would exterminate all our wild life in their selfish thirst for slaughter. We want your help.

RAY HOLLARD,
MAVA CLAPP,
Secretary of Atchison Gun Club.

ATCHISON, KANS., May 1, 1914.

Senator THOMPSON, Washington, D. C.:

Bird lovers of northeastern Kansas overwhelmingly favor $100,000 appropriation for Weeks-McLean migratory-bird law, and as you are a member of the Committee on Agriculture and have much influence with party leaders, they most earnestly petition your support for this important appropriation. Personally acquainted with hundreds of Kansas hunters, and ninety-nine out of one hundred favor law. Farmers to a man almost want it, and scores of persons in this locality are aroused over attempts made to defeat appropriation. Bird lovers here believe the majority of American citizens are entitled to your support over minority composed of market hunters and selfish individuals who want to continue unrestricted massacre of our wild birds in mating season. If you can, conscientiously, support and secure this meritorious, necessary measure.

EUGENE HOWE, Editor Atchison Globe.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. Is there——

Mr. OLIVER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED. I am delighted to see the Senator from Pennsylvania is so regular and so much in order this morning. It is not characteristic of him. I shall ask the question later.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk resolutions adopted by the tariff reform committee of the Reform Club of New York City, relative to the Panama Canal, and would like to have them read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

REFORM CLUB,
TARIFF REFORM COMMITTEE,
26 Beaver Street, New York City.

REFORM CLUB TARIFF COMMITTEE FAVORS REPEAL OF PANAMA CANAL FREE-TOLLS BILL.

At a meeting of the tariff reform committee of the Reform Club held May 8, 1914, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the tariff reform committee of the Reform Club is opposed to bounties and subsidies in any form; and

"Whereas the exemption of, or remission from, tolls in the Panama Canal of American vessels plying in the coastwise trade operates as a subsidy to a trade that is already heavily subsidized by the monopoly granted by our present repressive and antiquated navigation laws; and

"Whereas the history of shipping subsidies in the United States shows that they have not only failed to build up our merchant marine but have always been a source of public corruption; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal was paid for by and belongs to all of the people of this country, and it should not therefore be used mainly or largely for the benefit of the special few who by virtue of our narrow and exclusive navigation laws now monopolize our coastwise shipping; and

"Whereas the remission of tolls for American vessels would not, probably, for many years have any perceptible effect in lowering freight rates, and would therefore result in the payment of a Panama Canal tax by all of the people for the benefit of the coastwise shipping interests—mainly the transcontinental railroads and the Atlantic shipping consolidations; and

"Whereas our ships now go through the Suez, the Welland, and the Canadian Soo Canal on the same terms as do British-owned ships; and

"Whereas a discriminating policy as to tolls, apart from any and all other considerations, will provoke retaliation in some form: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the tariff reform committee of the Reform Club requests Congress to repeal the act permitting the free passage through the Panama Canal of vessels plying in the coastwise trade of the United States; and

"Be it further resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States and to all Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives."

BYRON W. HOLT, Chairman.

Mr. LEE of Maryland submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 360), which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and it is hereby, requested to prepare and bring in a bill for defining the duty and conferring the power and means upon some part of the Supply Corps of the United States Army to enlist the necessary men of proper mechanical skill and to acquire the necessary pipe, tools, pumping engines, well-boring machinery, auto trucks, and other transportation for promptly securing and distributing water supplies for drinking and washing purposes to United States troops in time of war or when war may be considered possible; and that the object of said bill should be to authorize all necessary details of officers from the Engineer Corps and Medical Corps and to use all available mechanical means in the hands of a disciplined and efficient service to create and keep a good water supply as near to the front as conditions render possible, and for which purpose the present contract system for Army water supplies is obviously inadequate; and that the said general purpose of said bill may be connected, if feasible, with increased facilities for the distribution of ammunition and food and water to advanced forces.

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT WILSON AT BROOKLYN NAVY YARD.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by President Wilson yesterday at the Brooklyn Navy Yard in honor of the dead who fell at Vera Cruz.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Mr. Secretary, I know that the feelings which characterize all who stand about me and the whole Nation at this hour are not feelings which can be suitably expressed in terms of attempted oratory or eloquence. They are things too deep for ordinary speech. For my own part, I have a singular mixture of feelings. The feeling that is uppermost is one of profound grief that these lads should have had to go to their death, and yet there is mixed with that grief a profound pride that they should have gone as they did, and, if I may say it out of my heart, a touch of envy of those who were permitted so quietly, so nobly to do their duty. Have you thought of it, men, here is the roster of the Navy, the list of the men, officers and enlisted men and marines, and suddenly there swim 19 stars out of the list—men who have suddenly gone into a firmament of memory, where we shall always see their names shine, not because they called upon us to admire them, but because they served us without asking any questions and in the performance of a duty which is laid upon us as well as upon them.

"Duty is not an uncommon thing, gentlemen. Men are performing it in the ordinary walks of life all around us all the time, and they are making great sacrifices to perform it. What gives men like these peculiar distinction is not merely that they did their duty, but that their duty had nothing to do with them or their own personal and peculiar interests. They did not give their lives for themselves. They gave their lives for us, because we called upon them as a Nation to perform an unexpected duty. That is the way in which men grow distinguished, and that is the only way, by serving somebody else than themselves. And what greater thing could you serve than a Nation such as this we love and are proud of. Are you sorry for these lads? Are you sorry for the way they will be remembered? Does it not quicken your pulses to think of the list of them? I hope to God none of you may join the list; but if you do, you will join an immortal company.

"So while we are profoundly sorrowful, and while their goes out of our heart a very deep and affectionate sympathy for the friends and relatives of those lads who for the rest of their lives shall mourn them, though with a touch of pride, we know why we do not go away from this occasion cast down, but with our heads lifted and our eyes on the future of this country, with absolute confidence of how it will be worked out. Not only upon the mere vague future of this country, but the immediate future. We have gone down to Mexico to serve mankind, if we can find out the way. We do not want to fight the Mexicans. We want to serve the Mexicans, if we can, because we know how we would like to be free and how we would like to be served if there were friends standing by ready to serve us. A war of aggression is not a war in which it is a proud thing to die, but a war of service is a thing in which it is a proud thing to die.

"Notice that these men were of our blood. I mean of our American blood, which is not drawn from any one country, which is not drawn from any one stock, which is not drawn from any one language of the modern world, but free men everywhere have sent their sons and their brothers and their daughters to this country in order to make that great compounded Nation which consists of all the sturdy elements and of all the best elements of the whole globe. I listened again to this list with a profound interest at the mixture of the names, for the names bear the marks of the several national stocks from which these men came. But they are not Irishmen or Germans or Frenchmen or Hebrews any more. They were not when they went to Vera Cruz. They were Americans, every one of them, and with no difference in their Americanism because of the stock from which they came. Therefore, they were in a peculiar sense of our blood, and they proved it by showing that they were of our spirit, that no matter what their derivation, no matter where their people came from, they thought and wished and did the things that were American; and the flag under which they served was a flag in which all the blood of mankind is united to make a free Nation.

"War, gentlemen, is only a sort of dramatic representation, a sort of dramatic symbol of a thousand forms of duty. I never went into battle. I never was under fire, but I fancy that there are some things just as hard to do as to go under fire. I fancy that it is just as hard to do your duty when men are sneering at you as when they are shooting at you. When they shoot at you they can only take your natural life; when they sneer at you they can wound your heart, and men who are brave enough, steadfast enough, steady in their principles enough to go about their duty with regard to their fellow men, no matter whether there are hisses or cheers, men who can do what Rudyard Kipling in one of his poems wrote, 'Meet with triumph and disaster and treat those two imposters just the same,' are men for a nation to be proud of. Morally speaking, disaster and triumph are imposters. The cheers of the moment are not what a man ought to think about, but the verdict of his conscience and of the consciences of mankind.

"So when I look at you I feel as if I also and we all were enlisted men. Not enlisted in your particular branch of the service, but enlisted to serve the country, no matter what may come, what though we may waste our lives in the arduous endeavor. We are expected to put the utmost energy of every power that we have into the service of our fellow men, never sparing ourselves, not condescending to think of what is going to happen to ourselves, but ready, if need be, to go to the utter length of complete self-sacrifice.

"As I stand and look at you to-day and think of these spirits that have gone from us I know that the road is clearer for the future. These boys have shown us the way, and it is easier to walk on it because they have gone before and shown us how. May God grant to all of us that vision of patriotic service which here in solemnity and grief and pride is borne in upon our hearts and consciences."

QUESTION OF CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a very brief communication on the subject of Panama Canal tolls exemption, written by Joseph C. Clayton, an able lawyer of Brooklyn, N. Y., and printed in the Brooklyn Eagle of a day or two ago. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTION OF CANAL TOLLS—A VERY BROAD VIEW OF A SUBJECT VERY MUCH DISCUSSED.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 1, 1914.

EDITOR BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE:

Both under international and statute law "the coasting trade"—that is, commercial navigation between the ports of a country—has long been restricted to her own shipping, flying her own flag. And that, too, whether or not the ports are both on the continent or on the continent and on a territory or other possession.

Whether or not in the future we or other nations should change this ancient rule one can not now say. But until there is such a change the old custom stands and rules the question of canal tolls.

I am unable to see that the effect of the Clayton-Bulwer and the Hay-Pauncefote treaties is to cancel this ancient law of the coasting trade.

Unquestionably the two treaties, construed together, forbid the creation of any new discriminations between nations in respect to the general use of the Panama Canal.

But as there already exists the old and well-recognized international custom that every country should discriminate in favor of its own ships in its coasting trade, it follows that adherence to that rule, in respect to United States ships using the canal between United States ports, was merely a continuance of an ancient practice which forbade foreign ships from trading between such ports.

The use of a canal instead of an open sea wrought no change in the "rule." Foreign ships can not use the canal in trade between United States ports, and so it follows that no injury can be done to them by exempting American vessels. Whether we collect or do not collect tolls on our ships which use the canal for trade between American ports can work no possible injury to foreign shippers; it can not concern them.

They do not and can not share in our coasting trade, and whether or not that trade be exempt from canal tolls is solely a domestic question and has no discriminating force against foreign shippers. And for these reasons I am unable to see that any treaty rights would be infringed by a statute or rule permitting the free use of the canal for American trade between American ports.

Of course, outside of anything in the treaties, the question may be raised, Is it expedient to exercise this restricted power of exemption for our coasting vessels, or to give it up?

Will the giving up of that exemption tend to the betterment of international relations to any extent substantial enough to warrant collection of tolls from our coasting vessels? I think not.

The canal has been built with no "penny wisdom," and that kind of wisdom is so apt to be "folly" that the United States can afford to act in either way, with or without tolls, on our coasting trade, as may in our mature judgment be "wisest, best, and most discreet."

We have the clear "power" either to tax or leave untaxed our coasting trade, and its use is determinable by high "policy" and not by the construction of treaty rights.

JOSEPH CULBERTSON CLAYTON.

PRODUCTION OF OIL IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the resolutions which I am about to read, which I think are of very great importance to the country as well as to the State of Oklahoma. The resolutions were passed at a meeting of the Independent Development League of Oklahoma, held at Oklahoma City, Okla., on the 23d day of April, 1914. They are as follows:

Resolutions.

At a meeting of the Independent Development League of Oklahoma held at Oklahoma City, Okla., on the 23d day of April, 1914, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we urge upon the President and Congress of the United States the pressing necessity and importance for immediate legislation to protect the oil industry from the monopoly which now controls prices to both the producer and consumer, and we suggest and recommend the following legislation:

"First. That all interstate pipe lines be made common carriers, subject to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the same laws that now regulate railways.

"Second. That no interstate pipe line company be permitted to engage directly or indirectly in the production, refining, or sale of oil or the by-products thereof.

"Third. That the Government construct and own a pipe line from some point in Oklahoma to the Gulf of Mexico for the purposes: (a) Of procuring oil at reasonable prices for the use of the Government; (b) to enable the Indian wards of the Government to dispose of their oil at reasonable prices; (c) to compete with and thereby compel monopolistic pipe line companies to carry and transport oil at a reasonable price.

"Fourth. Believing the time propitious for the entrance of the Federal Government into the oil fields of Oklahoma for the purchase of crude petroleum as a basis of fuel supply for its Navy we do now urge that negotiations for the acquiring of such supply be opened at once to the end that 10,000,000 barrels of privately stored oil be taken over. The opportunity for the purchase of steel storage now is present for the first time in more than seven years, and may not recur within another seven years.

"Fifth. The necessity for immediate and effective action is becoming more and more apparent from the large consumption of oil and gasoline throughout the country, with the astounding fact existing that a few men fix the price both to the consumer and producer; furnish the transportation at their own arbitrary price, without regulation or reference to the interests of either, and out of all just proportion maintain prices to the consumer unwarranted by the cost or price paid the producer.

"Sixth. That we request the active and immediate cooperation of the various departments of our National and State Governments and suppress discrimination on storage transportation and price of oil, both to producer and consumer, and to use the criminal laws, if necessary, to effect this result.

"Seventh. Be it further resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, respectfully requested to cause to be established a petroleum bureau for the prompt and efficient analysis of the commercial and comparative values of the various crude oils in the numerous fields of the United States, and to provide a thorough and comprehensive statistical bureau to promptly and independently acquire and publish statistical information showing the amount of stocks, pipe-line runs, and petroleum production in the United States, together with the relative supply and demand thereof, instead of the present system of relying upon the statistics furnished by the subsidized press of the monopolistic interests."

We believe such legislation as we have recommended will, in large measure, equalize prices, prevent unjust discrimination between producers and refiners not engaged in the pipe-line business, and afford the public the benefits of a cheaper fuel now furnished without regard to the welfare of any save those who fix the prices, and will thereby reestablish the conditions which the elimination of rebating by railroads to the oil monopoly brought about, and which condition was again overridden by the construction and use of uncontrolled pipe lines.

H. G. BEARD,
JOHN H. REBOLD,
Committee on Resolutions.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., April 25, 1914.

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been instructed by the Independent Development League to forward to you the inclosed resolutions which were unanimously adopted at a meeting of the league held in Oklahoma City April 23, 1914.

Respectfully,

C. F. COLCORD, President.
ELMER E. BROWN, Secretary.

I am not going to discuss this matter at all. I only pause to say that in Oklahoma our people are digging out of the ground between sixty and seventy million barrels of oil per annum, and that the price has been cut down in some of the fields from $1.05 a barrel, which they were receiving—less than half the price of oil in Pennsylvania—to 50 cents a barrel. Those who control transportation control absolutely the commerce of the country, control therefore the price of oil, control the people who produce the oil, and control the land that produces it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator refers to the difference between the price of Oklahoma oil and the price of Pennsylvania oil. I should like to ask him what proportion the price of Oklahoma oil bears to the price of Ohio oil, Indiana oil, or Illinois oil.

Mr. OWEN. The prices vary as you go west; but they do not vary according to the real value of the oil as determined by its chemical analysis, as determined by its distilling qualities as to the quantity of the higher and the lower products of the oil, nor as measured by transportation. They are arbitrarily controlled.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I wish to take direct issue with the accuracy of that statement. I say that the difference in the prices of oil is regulated solely upon the basis of its light-giving and heat-giving qualities.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. [Laughter].

Mr. OLIVER. I second the call.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday next, the 15th instant, following the morning business, I shall address the Senate briefly on the tolls question.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday, May 15, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate on the Panama Canal tolls issue.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Saturday next, the 16th instant, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate on the tolls question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I shall submit some observations on the Panama Canal tolls bill.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

S. 5445. An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson; and

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is unavoidably absent, as I have already noted, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 14385, the Panama Canal tolls bill, being the unfinished business, be now laid before the Senate, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] having previously given notice that at this time he would desire to address the Senate on the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, in the presentation of the views which I shall make, as the Senators who have preceded me, I would prefer to be permitted to continue uninterrupted until I close my remarks.

I shall also desire to use a number of letters and extracts from Senate and House documents. I may be able to state more briefly their contents at times than the reading would require, and when I do so I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may place in the RECORD the exact language of these documents, even though I have not read them. I ask the consent now so as to avoid asking it at the various times when I reach those parts of my speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the bill we are considering will repeal the provision of the Panama Canal act which permits vessels engaged in the United States coastwise transportation to pass through the Panama Canal without paying tolls.

I will vote for the bill on account of our treaties with Great Britain and Panama, and because, in my opinion, it is right that the owners of these vessels should bear, for using the canal, a fair part of the cost to our Government of building and operating it.

FORMER ATTITUDE OF SENATORS.

My distinguished friend, the junior Senator from New York, opened his address upon this subject a few days ago by having read the list of Senators who in 1912 voted against striking the provision of the canal bill which permitted coastwise vessels to pass through the canal free, and he seemed deeply concerned lest Senators now may vote for the repeal due to undue influence, and he seemed to think that by so voting they would yield a proper service of their own country to a service of Great Britain.

Mr. President, I have no fear that any Senator will fail to express by his vote his honest conviction of duty to his own country, and I trust the distinguished Senator will pardon me for observing that his great mind does not possess all of its usual judicial qualities where Great Britain is involved.

Referring to the votes cast two years ago, let me remind the Senate that the House of Representatives passed a bill at that time requiring all foreign-owned vessels and vessels owned by citizens of the United States engaged in foreign trade, to pay tolls when passing through the Panama Canal, but permitting vessels engaged in our coastwise trade to be taken through without payment of tolls.

This bill came to the Senate and was reported back by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals with a recommendation that all vessels owned by citizens of the United States should go through the canal without paying tolls.

It was perfectly clear to many of us that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would be violated if vessels owned by citizens of the United States engaged in foreign trade were permitted to go through the canal free of tolls while vessels owned by citizens of Great Britain were required to pay tolls. Many of us inclined to the belief at that time that we could defend the free passage of vessels engaged in the United States coastwise trade, and our efforts were concentrated upon defeating the flagrant violation of the treaty.

I may be justified in stating that during the debate in the summer of 1912 upon the Panama Canal bill I twice stated my doubt as to the passage even of the provision exempting our coastwise vessels from tolls, and added that the consequence might be that we should under the treaty permit vessels engaged in the Canadian coastwise trade to pass through the canal without paying tolls.

I also offered, and the Senate adopted, an amendment to restrict the provision as to coastwise vessels by adding the word "exclusively," so that the bill would read "vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States," and I further sought to amend the provision by requiring the vessels engaged in our coastwise transportation to pay the cost to the United States of carrying them through the canal.

I am sure that other Senators also voted then to permit our coastwise trade to be carried through the canal free, with great hesitation. After the declaration of Secretary Knox, that the plan by which President Taft fixed the tolls was based upon the theory that a failure to charge tolls against vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic was a subsidy, and the declaration of President Taft to the same effect, coupled with a further study and a broader study of the treaty, we were satisfied the provision ought never to have been inserted in the original act, and we are gratified now to have an opportunity to repeal it. Many of us reached this conclusion months ago, and are delighted that the President has brought the subject to the attention of the Congress by a special message.

PRESIDENT TAFT AND SECRETARY KNOX ADMIT IT IS A SUBSIDY.

The statement of Secretary Knox is found in his letter of January 17, 1913, to Irwin B. Loughlin, Esq., American Chargé d'Affaires, London, England, and in part is as follows:

> "The exemption of coastwise trade from tolls, or the refunding of tolls collected from coastwise trade, is merely a subsidy granted by the United States to that trade, and the loss resulting from not collecting, or refunding these tolls, will fall solely upon the United States."

The declaration from President Taft is found in his speech delivered January 31, 1914, in Ontario, Canada, in which he says, in part:

> "The idea of Congress in passing the bill, and my idea in signing it, was that we were thus giving a subsidy to our coastwise ships between New York and San Francisco, Boston and Seattle. * * * The tolls have been fixed on the canal for all the world on the assumption that the coastwise traffic is to pay tolls. Our giving it immunity from tolls does not in our judgment affect the traffic of other countries in any other way than it would affect it if we had voted a subsidy equal to the tolls remitted to our ships."

Mr. Taft was wrong in supposing that the idea of Democratic Senators and Congressmen in voting to free the coastwise trade from tolls was to give a subsidy to our coastwise ships. Had they known that he considered it necessary under the treaty to fix the tolls at a rate which estimated payment of tolls by the coastwise vessels, thus making the freedom of the coastwise vessels from paying tolls a clear subsidy, Democrats would not have disregarded their party platform and the established principles of their party by voting for this subsidy.

Our Republican friends need not be worried about Democrats keeping faith with the country. They are pledged against subsidies. A vote now to repeal this subsidy complies with party promises. If the plan adopted by President Taft for fixing tolls, clearly making free passage of coastwise vessels a subsidy, had been adopted before the Baltimore convention, even an officer of the corporations controlling the coastwise vessels could not have secured their exemption in the platform.

Action upon the bill before us requires the consideration of two questions:

First. Do we violate the agreement made between our Government and Great Britain by permitting coastwise vessels of the United States to be carried through the canal free of charge, while we require all other vessels to pay tolls for being carried through the canal?

Second. Is it economically sound to give a subsidy by free passage through the canal to the coastwise vessels of the United States?

IMPORTANCE OF TREATIES.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the first of these questions let me call attention to the vast importance to the people of the United States of our business relations with the balance of the world.

We sell to them; we buy from them.

If our commercial relations with other countries should cease, the agricultural and manufacturing industries of this country would be almost paralyzed, and thousands of families would be brought to want.

We make treaties with other nations for our mutual benefit just as individuals make contracts for their benefit.

It is essential to the prosperity of our people that treaties with foreign countries should be made.

We expect other nations to perform the obligations they owe to the United States as a result of treaties made with us.

As a matter of selfish interest, it is important to the people of the United States that the United States should perform the obligations it incurs as the result of treaties with other nations.

The standard of honor of a nation should be as precious as the standard of honor of an individual, and not only as a matter of interest, but as a matter of national character we should live up to our agreements.

No specious plea for standing up to our own country against Great Britain should blind us.

We do not serve our country when we aid our country to break its contracts and be false to its obligations.

Our agreement with Great Britain with reference to carrying vessels through the Panama Canal is continued in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, ratified by the Senate of the United States December 16, 1901. The paragraph of the treaty about which the contentions centers is clause 1 of article 3, and reads as follows:

> "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

I ask unanimous consent at this point to print as an appendix to my remarks the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Those who insist that the free passage of coastwise vessels of the United States through the canal does not violate the terms of the treaty support their contention upon some one of the following four propositions:

First. Vessels of commerce in international law, when used in treaties, apply strictly to vessels engaged in international or oversea commerce.

Second. The canal has been constructed upon territory over which the United States exercises the power of sovereignty, while the canal contemplated by the treaty was to be built on alien soil, and, therefore, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is inapplicable.

Third. The words "all nations," included in the foregoing clause, do not include the United States, and therefore do not require freedom of discrimination as to the conditions or charges of traffic as between citizens of the United States and subjects of Great Britain.

Fourth. There is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve coastwise trade from tolls, as no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic. For this reason freeing coastwise traffic of the United States from tolls does not interfere with the rights of any other nation.

Let us seek to find what is the true meaning of the clause of the treaty referred to, in view of the contentions named.

The rules for the interpretation of a treaty differ little from the rules applicable to the construction of ordinary contracts. Words are to be given their ordinary meaning. All parts of the contract may be considered to aid in finding the meaning of a particular portion of the contract. Perhaps a more liberal use of cotemporaneous writings is permitted in the interpretation of a treaty than in the interpretation of an ordinary contract. Finally, the meaning intended by the nations is the true test for construction of a treaty.

HISTORY OF THE TREATY.

From the earliest period of our history the United States has insisted upon equality of treatment for her citizens in waterways controlled by other countries, and has always been ready to concede to the vessels owned by citizens of other countries equality of treatment with vessels owned by citizens of the United States in the waters controlled by the United States. This had been the traditional policy of the United States for more than a century before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, and the representatives of the United States and of Great Britain were thoroughly familiar with this policy at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made in 1850. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not sought by Great Britain but by the United States. Great Britain in 1850 held a protectorate over the Mosquito coast. This protectorate covered the eastern port of the canal through Nicaragua, and this was the only route then considered practicable for a canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

The United States was deeply interested in a waterway between these two oceans, and a waterway in the control of which the United States would have an equal voice. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was sought by the United States to obtain this result.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Great Britain yielded her advantage and agreed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that—

> "the Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself an exclusive control over the said ship canal, agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same, or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America. * * * Nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other."

I ask permission to insert as an appendix to my remarks the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The United States and Great Britain in this treaty agreed jointly to protect the canal, and to protect any builder of the canal, subject, however, to the condition that this protection could be withdrawn—

> "if both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discrimination in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares or merchandise, or other articles"—

And so forth.

They furthermore agreed to extend their protection to any other practical communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications should the same prove practical, which were proposed to be established by way of Tehauntepec or Panama.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not except Panama from its provisions. It expressly named Panama.

In article 8, it was declared to be—

"understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

It must therefore be admitted that before the Clayton-Bulwer treaty Great Britain had the advantage of a protectorate over the eastern port, the use of which was considered necessary for the canal. By the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States obtained from Great Britain concessions that any canal to be built should be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, and that there should be no unfair discriminations in favor of commerce of either of the two over the commerce of the other.

From the first to the last of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the traditional policy of the United States to insist upon equality of treatment of the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain in the waters of each country was expressed. Every safeguard was observed to insure that the citizens of each of these countries should use the canal without any advantage in regard to commerce or navigation over the citizens and subjects of the other.

Article 8 set forth this general principle of neutralization in clear terms, for it provided that any and all canals or railways built across the Isthmus connecting North and South America are to be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, and that only such charges or conditions of traffic shall be fixed which the Governments of Great Britain and the United States will approve as just and equitable.

THE REJECTED TREATY.

Fifty years passed.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was still in force.

The United States had grown rich.

The importance of a canal across the Isthmus had increased, and the United States desired to be freed from the contract which made Great Britain a complete partner in the canal and wished to promote the project by itself.

After extended negotiations, a treaty was agreed upon and signed by Secretary Hay and Lord Pauncefote. By this treaty Great Britain gave up the right to a partnership in the canal and agreed to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States alone, but expressly declared that this was to be done "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization" established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The treaty furthermore provided that—

"The canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise."

The Senate of the United States amended this treaty by inserting a provision that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded, and, furthermore, by inserting a provision declaring that the conditions and stipulations shall not apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

Great Britain declined to accede to these amendments, and our representatives began the preparation of a new treaty between Great Britain and the United States.

It will be observed that the objections made in the Senate did not apply to those provisions of the treaty which neutralized the canal and required it open on terms of entire equality, so that there would be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

THE PRESENT HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The new treaty contained again the preamble declaring that it was to be made "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention (the Clayton-Bulwer treaty)."

The term "neutralization" has been used in modern times with reference to impartial treatment of the citizens of nations without any reference whatever to conditions of war. An examination of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty shows that it has no reference to war, but provides for neutralization or impartial treatment of the citizens of the United States and Great Britain by declaring that—

"the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of other states,"

And so forth.

Thus the preamble of the treaty expressly declares its application to citizens of Great Britain and citizens of the United States, and that the canals or railways built across the Isthmus are to be open to each on equal terms.

Article 3 begins with the declaration that—

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, i. e.:

"First. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

Clause 1 must be construed in connection with the preamble, which declares that the citizens of the United States and the subjects of Great Britain are to use the canal or railway built across the Isthmus on equal terms.

It must also be construed in connection with the declaration that the rules are substantially as embodied in the rules covering the free navigation of the Suez Canal. While the United States adopts the rules, they were adopted as part of a treaty which makes them binding upon Great Britain and the United States.

These two provisions in the treaty make it impossible to put upon clause 1 any construction which does not place citizens of the United States and subjects of Great Britain upon equal terms. The preamble expressly names them as being entitled to equal terms in the use of the canal. The vessels of citizens of the United States and of subjects of Great Britain use the Suez Canal on equal terms, paying exactly the same rates of tolls.

THE MEANING OF "ALL NATIONS"

The contention that the words "all nations" mean "all other nations," and therefore do not include the United States, is based upon a rule of construction which might have been applicable if the United States at that time had owned the canal and the territory through which the canal was built and was simply granting a privilege to some other nation.

The contention, even then, would have had no force under the present treaty, because the treaty in its preamble declared that the general principle of neutralization of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should not be impaired, and the treaty declared that the rules adopted are substantially those embodied in the convention of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

These provisions of the treaty prevented discrimination against citizens or subjects of any nation in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise, and required that the term "all nations" should include the United States.

In point of fact, the United States at that time owned nothing. It had not been settled that it would own the canal. The treaty provided that—

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscriptions to or purchase of stock or shares, subject to the provisions of the present treaty."

So the language of clause 1 was drawn to cover conditions as they existed; to cover a canal in which the United States might have a majority of the stock, a part of the stock, or no stock; to cover a canal built by some corporation backed by the United States in a country foreign to the United States. The language was intended to cover the canal whether the United States built it on land owned or not owned by the United States, and in either event there was to be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

The provisions in clause 2, article 3, of the treaty, permitting the United States to maintain "such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder," could only have been placed in the treaty upon the theory that the United States might not own the territory upon which the canal was built.

Article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided that a change of sovereignty; that is, the acquirement of sovereignty over the Canal Zone by the United States, should not affect "the general principle of neutralization." These are the words used in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to preserve commercial equality.

Article 4 preserved to the citizens of Great Britain and the United States their equality in commercial matters, but did not seek in any other respect to limit the power of the United States over the Canal Zone if the United States should become the owner of the Canal Zone.

The acquirement of the Canal Zone by the United States gave the United States the right, even without treaty provision, to maintain a military police upon the canal. It gave the right to embark and disembark troops. It gave the right to fortify the canal, and Great Britain promptly agreed that the right of fortification, under the treaty, existed when the United States became the owner of the zone.

The term "vessels of commerce and war of all nations" is used, vessels of commerce and war being treated in the same way, for the reason that the United States might not be the owner of the canal, but might be dealing with a corporation owning the canal, just as Great Britain controls the majority of the stock of the Suez Canal.

If the United States should own alone the canal, of course the vessels of war of the United States would not be charged tolls, for to charge them tolls would be to take the money out of the Treasury of the United States simply to put it back; but, without regard to the question as to whether the United States owned a part of the stock of the canal or all of the stock and the land on which it was located, the canal was to be free and open to the vessels of commerce owned by citizens of the United States and Great Britain on terms of entire equality.

The effort to take the United States out of the operation of the words "all nations," is to take from the words their ordinary meaning in utter disregard of other provisions of the treaty which expressly declare that the equality of treatment with reference to the use of the canal was to be between citizens of the United States and subjects of Great Britain.

It is an effort to pick out single words, and place upon them forced and false construction.

VESSELS OF COMMERCE.

What I have said with reference to the term "all nations" is equally applicable to the suggestion that "vessels of commerce" should be construed to apply alone to vessels engaged in international trade.

Wharton's Law Dictionary has been cited in support of this construction. The definition there given is:

> "Commerce relates to our dealings with foreign nations, colonies,"

And so forth.

The Standard Dictionary defines "commerce" as follows:

> "The exchange of goods, productions, or property of any kind, especially exchange on a large scale as between States or nations; extended trade."

Webster's New International Dictionary gives this definition of "commerce":

> "Business intercourse; the exchange or buying and selling of commodities, and particularly the exchange of merchandise on a large scale between different places and communities; extended trade or traffic."

The Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, volume 7, page 412, defines "commerce" as follows:

> "Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all of its forms, including transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of one country and the citizens or subjects of other countries, and between the citizens of different States."

So, it will be seen that when Wharton, in his law dictionary, was defining commerce as relating to dealings with foreign nations, colonies, and so forth, he simply meant that it was extended trade.

The term "vessels of commerce" has no distinctive title in law dictionaries or other works so far as I have been able to find. The suggestion of an international definition for vessels of commerce must depend for its origin upon the genius of the junior Senator from New York.

While Wharton gives a more restricted definition of commerce than the other authorities I quote, even his definition would make trading with Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts, commerce.

Those who seek to restrict the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by picking here a word and there a word in disregard of the entire tenor of the treaty, merely disclose the unshakable fact that the treaty intended to provide for the use of the canal by the citizens of the United States and the subjects of Great Britain, and of other nations, observing the rules prescribed, so that there would be no discrimination against any of the citizens with respect to the conditions or charges of traffic for passing their commerce through the canal.

CHANGE OF SOVEREIGNTY NOT TO AFFECT THE RIGHTS OF SUBJECTS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

But it has been insisted that the canal contemplated by the treaty was to be built on alien soil, and now that it has been constructed upon territory over which the United States exercises the power of sovereignty, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is inapplicable.

How such a contention can seriously be presented I can not understand, in view of article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which reads as follows:

> "It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

It is well known that pending the negotiation of this treaty it was suggested that the United States might purchase a strip of land contiguous to the canal, if the canal was built; and article 4 of the treaty was prepared by Secretary Hay to meet the demand of the British Government, that the equality of treatment of the citizens of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States, in respect to their commerce passing through the canal, might be preserved, even though the United States became sole owner of the territory through which the canal was built.

Secretary Hay used the exact language found in the preamble, viz, "the general principle of neutralization," the preamble having declared that the new treaty was made without impairing "the general principle of neutralization" established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and, as I have before stated, that general principle of neutralization was that the canal "shall be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and of Great Britain on equal terms."

It will be observed that article 4, in utilizing the term "principle of neutralization," used the language of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which does not carry an objection to the fortification of the canal by the United States and does not exclude other uses incident to ownership connected with the defense of the territory or the defense of the Nation.

Article 18 of our treaty with Panama, under which we obtained title to the zone, couples with that title the following provision:

> "The canal when constructed and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity and shall be open upon the terms provided by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Government of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901."

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is made a part of the title to the property in the treaty of conveyance from Panama which gives our country the title.

Talk of terminating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from a legal standpoint is absurd.

It would terminate our right legally to possession of the canal itself.

It would compel us to give up the canal, unless we abandoned our attitude as a law-abiding Nation and resorted alone to battleships and brute force to keep the property.

Our right to fortify and use the canal as a national defense followed ownership of the zone, and Great Britain by promptly conceding this fact conformed to the terms of the treaty.

Mr. Henry White and Mr. Choate are the two living Americans who represented the United States in these negotiations. Mr. White, referring to this subject before the Interoceanic Committee, said:

> "It was always assumed by those carrying on the negotiations—it certainly was by me in my interview with Lord Lansdowne—that we meant our ships should be considered, or, rather, that the United States should be considered as included in the term "all nations."

How can any rational man, in view of the terms of the treaty and the declaration of Mr. White, believe that the passage of this bill compromises the dignity and the honor of our country?

I enter my protest against the suggestion that it is a betrayal of the American people to live up to our treaty agreements.

The dishonor would come from their breach.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. WHITE, MR. CHOATE, AND REPRESENTATIVES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

I have carefully examined all of the correspondence furnished by the State Department, and it covers the subject from the earliest letter written, December 7, 1898, by Mr. Hay to Mr. White down to the present time.

I invite those who seek to construe the term "all nations" in clause 1 of article 3 of the treaty as meaning all nations other than the United States to find a single word in the entire correspondence which would justify such a construction. On the contrary, over and over again in this correspondence is disclosed the fact that the parties to this treaty intended that citizens and subjects of the United States, in respect to conditions or charges of traffic through this canal, should be placed upon an entire equality with citizens and subjects of Great Britain.

As far back as December 22, 1898, Mr. White, in a telegram to Mr. Hay from London at the very opening of the negotiations, looking toward relieving the United States from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, wrote with reference to the attitude of the British Government on the construction of the canal:

> "I do not believe, if it is opened to all nations on equal terms, there will be any serious difficulty in effecting an agreement satisfactory to both nations."

Clearly here he was including the United States in the term "all nations."

A letter written by him on the same day to Mr. Hay contained the following statement:

> "Lord Salisbury said nothing to lead me to think he is unfavorably disposed, much less hostile, to the construction of the canal under our auspices, provided it is to be open to the ships of all countries on equal terms."

In the same letter he wrote:

> "In this connection, I inclose an article which appeared in the London Spectator of the 10th, and which embodies the opinion, I think, of a very considerable majority of those who have given this matter attention in this country."

The following are some extracts from that editorial:

> "The Times says most reasonably that if the freedom of the waterways are secured to the ships of all nations as in the case of the Suez Canal, we do not see what object we should have in standing strictly upon claims which originated when circumstances were altogether different."
> "All we want is that the canal shall be made and that when it is made it shall be open and available to our merchant ships and ships of war as freely as to those of the United States and all other powers."
> "Supposing the canal ours, or merely the property of Nicaragua, a hostile power might block it in the first instance as our property, and in the second in defiance of the weak State. If, however, it is controlled by America we need have no fear of being unable to use it, for it will be in hands strong enough to defend it."
>
> "We fail then to see why we should make ourselves disagreeable to the Americans by vetoing the canal."
>
> "What answer are we to make to America if, or rather when, she asks us to agree to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? It has been suggested that we should ask for compensation or try to make a bargain for trade vessels."
> "We would rather abrogate the treaty out of good will and good feeling than for any direct quid pro quo. Let us show the world that though in a case of foreigners we shall be tenacious of our treaty rights to the last iota, we can in the case of our own kith and kin think of their interests and wishes as well as of our own."
> "We would abrogate the treaty on the following terms:
> "'* * * That the duties charged should be the same in the case of American and other vessels.'"

Copies of many of the letters written by Mr. Choate to Secretary Hay are now printed for the use of the Senate.

Lord Pauncefote was insisting that the treaty should apply not only to the first canal built, but any subsequent canal. Mr. Choate was objecting to such a provision. On August 20, 1901, Mr. Choate wrote Secretary Hay:

> "As article 8 stands, in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it undoubtedly contemplates further treaty stipulations—not these treaty stipulations, in case any other interoceanic route, either by land or by water, should 'prove to be practicable,' and it proceeds to state that the general principle to be applied is to be no other charges or conditions of traffic thereon 'than are just and equitable,' and that said 'canals or railways' being open to the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the subjects and citizens of other States, which I believe to be the real general principle of neutralization (if you choose to call it so) intended to be asserted by this eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty."

The importance of this statement from Mr. Choate will be appreciated if we keep in mind the fact that the treaty finally ratified declares that the general principle of neutralization in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not to be impaired by this new treaty, and Mr. Choate wrote, pending the negotiations of the treaty, that the general principle of neutralization intended to be inserted was that the canals or railways were to be open to subjects of Great Britain and the United States on equal terms.

Further on in the same letter Mr. Choate suggested that if Great Britain insisted upon extending the treaty to future canals it might be provided "in view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is reaffirmed, the United States hereby declares that it will impose no other charges or conditions of traffic upon any other canal that may be built across the Isthmus than are just and equitable, and that such canals shall be open to the subjects and citizens of the United States and of all other nations on equal terms."

The additional clause became unnecessary because Great Britain did not insist that the treaty should apply to more than the one canal.

Mr. Hay, in replying, said:

> "Your views are so clear and definite and so entirely in accord with my own that I find it unnecessary to give you any extended instructions as to this very important matter."

In a letter of September 21 Mr. Choate explains that Lord Pauncefote wished an additional clause to preserve more specifically the protection of Great Britain in the event the United States acquired territory on both sides of the canal, and lest the United States might then claim that "a treaty providing for the neutrality of a canal running through a neutral country could no longer apply to a canal that ran through American territory only."

Mr. Choate said:

> "I insisted that these ideas were already included in your 4, that is, within the words 'the general principle of neutralization,' especially in the light of that phrase as used in the preamble, where it is 'neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty'; that if not included within that it certainly was in the phrase 'obligations of the high contracting parties under this treaty.'"

Mr. Choate proceeded:

> "He still insisted that it should not be left to the construction of general clauses, but should be explicitly stated. Believing as I do that you had no thought of escaping from the obligations of article 3, clause 1, in any such contingency as change of territorial sovereignty, and that you had intended it to be included in your language in 4, I wrote down the words 'or the freedom of passage of the canal to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality and without discrimination, as provided by article 3,' and asked him if those words were added to your 4 it would satisfy him as a substitute for Lord Lansdowne's 3-A."

On September 31 Secretary Hay telegraphed Mr. Choate:

> "The President cordially approves draft of canal treaty and your instructions. I do not consider the proposed addition to article 4 as necessary or as improving the article, but if the British Government strongly insists you may accept it."

In the further discussion of this subject it appears that Mr. Choate satisfied Lord Pauncefote that this additional clause was unnecessary and that article 4, even in case the Government of the United States became owner of the land on which the canal was dug, still preserved to Great Britain the neutralization clause of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, by which citizens of the United States and citizens of Great Britain would use the canal on terms of equality.

On September 25 Mr. Choate wrote Secretary Hay:

"I judged from your cable that you agreed with me that the words proposed to be added did not really alter the meaning of your 4, but only added a specification of what was there included in general terms."

In a letter of October 2, 1901, Mr. Choate concluded with the statement, referring to Lord Lansdowne:

"In substance he abrogates the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, gives us an American canal—ours to build as and where we like, to own, control, and govern—on the sole condition of its being always neutral and free for the passage of the ships of all nations on equal terms, except that if we get into a war with any nation we can shut its ships out and take care of ourselves."

SECRETARY HAY TO SENATOR CULLOM.

Secretary Hay on December 12, 1901, wrote Senator Cullom of the treaty which had then been sent to the Senate, among other things, as follows:

"The draft of the new treaty was transmitted by Lord Pauncefote to Lord Lansdowne, and its treatment by him manifested a most conciliatory spirit and an earnest desire to reach a conclusion which should be satisfactory to the United States, if this could be done without departing from the great principle of neutrality, including the use of the canal by all nations on equal terms, for which Great Britain had always contended."

It will be observed that this language used by Secretary Hay is not the language of a grant by the United States to some other country, but a general expression with reference to the purposes of the negotiation, and certainly no one will question that it included the United States in the term "all nations."

Quoting further from the letter above referred to from Secretary Hay to Senator Cullom:

"He considered that the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which had been inserted by way of an amendment in the former treaty without any previous opportunity for consideration of the matter by Great Britain, would not now be regarded as inadmissible, if sufficient provision were made in the new treaty for anything in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which it was any longer of material interest to Great Britain to preserve."

"The President considered * * * that for the present a convention for the building of one canal at the cost of the United States, for the equal benefit of them all, was all that could be wisely attempted. He not only was willing, but earnestly desired, that the general principle of neutralization, referred to in the preamble of this treaty, and in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, should be perpetually applied to this canal. * * * He recognized the entire justice and propriety of the demand of Great Britain, that if she was asked to surrender the material interest secured by the first article of that treaty, which might result at some indefinite future time in a change of sovereignty in the territory traversed by the canal, the general principle of neutralization as applied to the canal should be absolutely secured, and that a clause should be added to the draft treaty by which the parties should agree that no change of sovereignty or of international relations of the territory traversed by the canal should affect this general principle or the obligations of the parties under this treaty."

When Secretary Hay submitted to the President for transmission to the Senate the agreement covering the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, he called attention to the fact that the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States was to be "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention."

President Roosevelt, in sending the treaty to the Senate, closed his letter with the statement that the "new treaty was made without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention."

Senator Cushman K. Davis, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, presented to the Senate the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. He declared that in building the canal there was to be "no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind, but perfect equality for all, with no privilege to the United States," and that the United States could not take an attitude in opposition to equal use of the canal by all nations without discrimination. I quote the following extracts from his report:

"That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practical, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality of all.

"That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belongs to all mankind. * * *

"As to neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain. In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to this treaty on account of the features of neutrality, its equal and impartial use by all other nations. * * *

"No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and always open on terms of impartial equity to the ships and commerce of the world.

"Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the two great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

"The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe and not of Great Britain alone. Whenever a canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien, it will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control. * * *

"The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations without discrimination. * * *

"That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less, and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration.

"The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment."

Nobody can read the correspondence between our representatives and the representatives of Great Britain or the correspondence between Mr. Choate and Mr. Hay, carried on while this treaty was being made, and doubt that the "all nations" in clause 1 of article 3 was intended to include the United States, and that the preamble to the treaty was meant to fix upon the treaty the general principle of neutralization contained in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the effect that the canal was to be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and of Great Britain on equal terms.

An appeal to our love of country should always find ready response, but no love of country should influence us to seek to escape from the plain purposes of an agreement with another country by hair-splitting and technical refinements of construction, especially when the possibility of such a course was suggested by the representatives of the other country when the negotiations were being conducted and when our representatives assured the representatives of the other country that the construction now being sought to be placed upon this treaty by those who deny its application to citizens of the United States could not possibly be made.

WILL FREE PASSAGE OF COASTWISE VESSELS VIOLATE THE TREATY?

But it is contended that even if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty prevents a discrimination from being made between vessels of Great Britain and vessels of the United States engaged in foreign trade which pass through the Panama Canal, still, as our coastwise transportation is limited entirely to American vessels, to permit the free passage of these vessels would be no discrimination against the vessels owned by British citizens.

The case is well put by Mr. Roosevelt, on January 18, 1913, in the Outlook, when he said:

"I believe the position of the United States is proper as regards coastwise traffic. I think we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic. There is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise trade from tolls."

If the treaty applied alone to the owners of ships, the conclusion of President Roosevelt would be sound. It would be fortified by the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olesen against Smith. This case arose out of a treaty with Great Britain containing the following language:

"No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States."

Passing upon the case, Mr. Justice White said:

"Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade."

When the Panama Canal bill was before the Senate in 1912 I called attention to this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and justified the provision permitting free passage for vessels engaged in the United States coastwise traffic. I, however, added at that time that the effect might be to require the United States also to permit vessels engaged in Canadian coastwise traffic to pass through the canal free. The treaty considered in the Olesen case is limited to vessels. It does not apply to discriminations against citizens other than vessel owners.

During the debate upon this subject, in 1912, I do not think the attention of Senators was called to the fact that the language of clause 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty might be construed to apply to the commerce of citizens of the United States, and all other North American and South American countries similarly situated as to coastwise trade. Since then I have made a careful investigation of this view of the question. It will be observed that the clause not only provides that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce, but it shall be so open and so used "that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

It is now contended that this language is broad enough to prevent rates of tolls which would discriminate against the commerce of citizens of Canada. In other words, the provision is broad enough to require that a vessel sailing from New York to Vancouver, carrying a cargo of goods to citizens of Vancouver, should pass through the canal with the same rates of tolls as a vessel sailing from New York to Seattle, carrying goods to citizens of the State of Washington. We can not deny that to permit vessels to pass through the canal without paying tolls when goods are carried from New York to Seattle, while a vessel going through the canal from New York to Vancouver was required to pay tolls, would be a discrimination against the commerce of the citizens of Vancouver.

Was the treaty intended to be applied to such a case?

THE LAKE CANAL TREATY.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the treaty made in 1871 between the United States and Great Britain applicable to the tolls of the Welland and other Canadian canals. This treaty reads:

"The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

Under this treaty Canada fixed the tolls for vessels passing through the Welland Canal at 20 cents per ton and made the charge equally applicable to vessels owned by citizens of the United States and to vessels owned by citizens of Canada, but subsequently a rebate of 18 cents per ton was allowed upon the merchandise going to Montreal, while a similar rebate was denied to merchandise going to cities on the American side of Lake Ontario.

It was claimed that the effect of this treaty was to give an advantage to the commerce of citizens of the Dominion over the commerce of citizens of the United States. On August 23, 1888, President Cleveland sent a message to Congress protesting against what he claimed to be a violation of treaty rights of citizens of the United States by the Government of Canada:

In this message he said:

"The equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion which we were promised in the use of the canals of Canada did not secure to us freedom from tolls in their navigation, but we had a right to expect that we, being Americans and interested in American commerce, would be no more burdened in regard to the same than Canadians engaged in their own trade; and the whole spirit of the concession made was, or should have been, that merchandise and property transported to an American market through these canals should not be enhanced in its cost by tolls many times higher than such as were carried to an adjoining Canadian market. All our citizens—producers and consumers, as well as vessel owners—were to enjoy the equality promised.

"And yet evidence has for some time been before the Congress, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that while the tolls charged in the first instance are the same to all, such vessels and cargoes as are destined to certain Canadian ports are allowed a refund of nearly the entire tolls, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage.

"To promise equality and then in practice make it conditioned upon our vessels doing Canadian business instead of their own is to fulfill a promise with the shadow of performance."

After this message from President Cleveland to Congress the State Department took up with the state department of Great Britain the complaint of our Nation on account of the rebate given by Canada to her coastwise business. Great Britain contended, representing the views of Canada, that the treaty only applied to owners of vessels and did not apply to a discrimination between the rates charged vessels going to cities of the United States and Canada. Nothing was accomplished at that time.

On June 20, 1892, in response to a Senate resolution asking for information, President Harrison reviewed the entire subject. He called attention to the report of Mr. Partridge, the Solicitor of the Department of State, and to a letter from Mr. Blaine. He condemned the rebate of 18 cents a ton upon goods going to Montreal. He said:

"That these orders as to canal tolls and rebates are in direct violation of article 27 of the treaty of 1871 seems to be clear. It is wholly evasive to say that there is no discrimination between Canadian and American vessels; that the rebate is allowed to both without favor upon grain carried through to Montreal or transshipped at a Canadian port to Montreal. The treaty runs: 'To secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.'

"It was intended to give to consumers in the United States, to our people engaged in railroad transportation, and to those exporting from our ports equal terms in passing their merchandise through these canals. This absolute equality of treatment was the consideration for concession on the part of this Government made in the same article of the treaty, and which have been faithfully kept.

"It is a matter of regret that the Canadian Government has not responded promptly to our request for the removal of these discriminating tolls. * * * In view of the fact that the Canadian commissioners still contest with us the claim that these tolls are discriminating and insist that they constitute no violation of the letter or spirit of article 27 of the treaty, it would seem appropriate that Congress, if the view held by the Executive is approved, should with deliberation and yet with promptness take such steps as may be necessary to secure the just rights of our citizens."

On July 1 following he again brought this subject to the attention of Congress, and declared:

"There can be no doubt that a serious discrimination against our citizens and our commerce exists, and quite as little doubt that this discrimination is not the incident but the purpose of the Canadian regulation."

He accompanied his message with an elaborate review of the subject by Assistant Secretary of State Adee. Thereupon the House of Representatives brought in an act authorizing the President to put into effect retaliatory duties. The report was presented by Mr. Blount, who called attention to the treaty between Great Britain and the United States of 1871, which provided for terms of equality between citizens of the United States and Great Britain as to the use of the Welland Canal, and further said:

"It was claimed on the part of the Canadian Government that as the rebate applied to 'vessels,' and our vessels were covered by its terms provided their cargoes took the lines indicated by the order, there was absolute equality; but the language of the treaty shows that it had relation not to vessels but to citizens.

"It was intended for the benefit of the consumers in our own country; it was intended to give advantage to our ports; it was intended to give advantage to our transportation companies. The Canadians have sought, by this technical construction, to evade the spirit of the treaty."

Mr. Hitt also, in advocating the legislation which authorized retaliation by the United States, said:

"By our treaty with Great Britain, the words of which have just been read to the House, we are entitled to 'the use of that canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada.' * * * Uncover all the masks of words and equivocations in this voluminous correspondence and there stands out the bald fact that American trade is subjected to just ten times the burden to which Canadian trade is subjected in passing through the canal. * * * This burden is laid on the commerce of the North and Northwest and the citizens of the ports of the United States entitled to enjoy this export trade and by treaty to equality in the use of the Welland Canal."

Congress passed the bill, and the President of the United States, on August 18, issued a proclamation putting the retaliatory provision into execution. Thereupon Canada receded. It abandoned the rebate, and by proclamation February 20, 1893, the retaliatory duties were withdrawn.

If, under the treaty applicable to the Welland and other canals in Canada, the commerce of the cities of the two countries, so far as the canal was concerned, were to receive equality, if our Government was right in the contention which it then made, how can we avoid the conclusion that our Government is wrong now?

If we permit vessels from New York City to Seattle, carrying the commerce of the people of Washington, to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls and require a vessel carrying from New York to Vancouver cargoes of goods for the people of that coast to pay tolls, we would be taxing the commerce of the citizens of the Dominion of Canada, while we would not be taxing the commerce of the citizens of the United States similarly situated.

If, under our Panama Canal act, we provided that vessels sailing from eastern or western coasts of the United States to the opposite coast of the United States should receive a rebate of 90 per cent of their tolls, if they landed their cargoes on our own coast, and that the same vessels or Canadian vessels sailing from one coast to the other coast, and landing their cargoes at Canadian ports, should have no such rebate, we would be doing, under the present treaty, just what Canada did under the treaty which applied to their lake canals.

If giving a rebate of 90 per cent of the tolls to vessels landing their cargoes in ports of the United States would be a discrimination against the commerce of the citizens of the Dominion of Canada, how much more would the discrimination exist if the rebate amounted to all of the tolls, or if the vessels were carried through the canal without paying any tolls?

Let us place the language of the two treaties side by side.

The Welland Canal treaty undertook to secure "to the citizens of the United States use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that "the canal shall be free and open on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise."

If the Welland Canal treaty extended beyond the owners of vessels to the commerce of the citizens, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty certainly does the same thing; and if it does, we can not charge one rate at the canal for the commerce of the cities on the United States coast and another rate at the canal for commerce of citizens on the coast of the Dominion of Canada.

If we were right then, we are wrong now. If we are right now, we were wrong then.

Will anyone claim that the British Government in urging Canada to yield to our construction of the lake treaty in 1892 improperly yielded to the United States, or that the conduct of Great Britain in this matter showed a lack of proper courage or assertion of national rights?

Yet the concession was made to us by Great Britain and Canada in 1892, and the discrimination against the commerce of the citizens in the ports of the United States, in favor of the commerce of the citizens of the ports of Canada, was abandoned. Canada may again assert her right to follow the construction she then placed upon the treaty, but she has yielded to the extent of abolishing the rebates.

It is generally understood that in the summer of 1912 the home Government at London was not aggressive in its objection to the claim of the United States with reference to passing coastwise vessels through the canal free, but that representatives of Canada and British America brought their complaint to the attention of the Government in London and asserted their rights. Can we complain that they should not have done so?

Had not the offices of the home Government in London helped induce them to yield to us in 1892 upon a similar treaty and a similar issue? How could the Government in London fail to respond under the circumstances and assert that we ought to follow in our construction of the Panama Canal treaty the construction we ourselves had placed upon the lake canal treaty?

For the present argument it is not necessary to express an opinion as to the meaning of this part of the language of the treaty, but if we insist upon our present construction, I do say that we ought promptly to notify Canada that we were wrong in 1892, and that Canada is at perfect liberty to grant such rebates as that Government might desire for the cities of the Dominion of Canada as against the cities of the United States.

Do we realize the enormous volume of this trade, and what it would mean to our northeastern facilities of transportation? It is understood that Canada is deepening these canals; that she is taking steps to greatly improve their value, and that an abandonment of our former contention with reference to these treaties would be injurious not alone to the State of New York and the New England States, but to the Middle Western States whose products are served at least in considerable part by the use of the Canadian canals.

Mr. Choate, in his letter of April 13, 1914, transmitting his correspondence while he was acting as ambassador to the Court of St. James, with Secretary Hay, makes the following statement:

"These, if carefully perused, will, I think, be found to confirm my view that the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting our coastwise shipping from tolls is a clear violation of the treaty."

ALL COUNTRIES IN NORTH AND SOUTH AMERICA INTERESTED.

But the Dominion of Canada is not the only one of our neighbors interested in this question. All of North and South America is interested. Mexico, the countries of Central America, and the countries of South America. We are seeking to cultivate trade with our North and South American neighbors. We are seeking to build up our commerce with them. Shall we say to them that we will make treaties promising equality, which they may justly consider extending to the commerce of their people, and yet seek to discriminate in favor of the commerce of the citizens of the United States? Our citizens are interested in the entire commerce of America, not alone in trading with each other, and it would be a mistake in policy for us to injure our trade relations with our neighbors by causing them to feel that we were seeking to enforce a construction of a treaty in our favor just contrary to a construction which we placed upon a similar treaty when the different construction was in our favor.

And when the President in his message referred to other difficulties to be caused by the passage of our coastwise vessels through the canal without charge, while I do not speak ex cathedra, I may well conceive that he had in view our general relations with all of our neighbors in America, and not what many have suggested, some ulterior purpose in connection with the Government of Great Britain.

We have treaties with all the nations of the world. They were made to protect the interests of our people. It is essential that other nations should live up to those treaties. How can we ask them to do so if our Government fails to live up to the obligations it has assumed in those treaties?

The objections under the treaty to permitting the coastwise traffic of the United States to pass through the canal without paying tolls may be summed up in the following propositions:

First. Clause 1, article 3, of the treaty applies not only to the owners of vessels, but to the citizens and subjects of the respective countries and, together with the balance of the treaty, requires that no discrimination as to such citizens and subjects shall be made in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic through the canal.

Second. The coastwise vessels will naturally stop at the ports of Cuba, Mexico, Central America, Panama and, perhaps, elsewhere. Their cargoes will not be limited exclusively to bona fide coastwise traffic of the United States.

Third. Traffic from foreign countries will be unloaded at ports of the United States to be immediately reloaded in a coastwise vessel for passage through the canal to the opposite coast of the United States, thus in reality carrying through the canal foreign traffic in coastwise vessels without paying tolls.

It has been claimed that Chargé d'Affaires Innes, the representative of Great Britain, in a letter dated July 8, 1912, admitted to Secretary Knox the right of the United States to give an exemption from tolls to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. This is not a correct statement of his attitude. The language which he used was this:

> "As to the proposal that examption shall be given to vessels engaged in coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it might be that no objection could be taken. But it appears to our Government that it will be impossible to frame regulations which will prevent the exemption from resulting in a preference to United States shipping and, consequently, in an infraction of the treaty."

SIR EDWARD GREY'S LETTER.

In a letter dated November 14, 1912, handed to the Secretary of State by the British ambassador December 9, Sir Edward Grey called the attention of our Government to the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Referring to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, he wrote:

> "So long as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force, therefore, the position was that both parties to it had given up their power of independent action, because neither was at liberty to construct the canal and thereby obtain the exclusive control which construction would confer. It is also clear that if the canal had been constructed while the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force it would have been open in accordance with article 8 to British and United States ships on equal terms, and equally clear, therefore, that the tolls leviable on such ships would have been identical.
> "The purpose of the United States in negotiating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to recover their freedom of action and obtain the right which they had surrendered to construct the canal themselves; this is expressed in the preamble to the treaty, but the complete liberty of action consequential upon such construction was to be limited by the maintenance of the general principle embodied in article 8 of the earlier treaty. That principle, as shown above, was one of equal treatment for both British and United States ships, and a study of the language of article 4 shows that the word 'neutralization' in the preamble of the latter treaty is not there confined to belligerent operations, but refers to the system of equal rights for which article 8 provided. * * *
> "* * * I notice that in the course of the debate in the Senate on the Panama Canal bill the argument was used by one of the speakers that the third, fourth, and fifth rules embodied in article 3 of the treaty shows that the words 'all nations' can not include the United States, because if the United States were at war it is impossible to believe it could be intended to be debarred by the treaty from using its own territory for revictualing its warships or landing troops.
>
> "The same point may strike others who read nothing but the text of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, and I think it therefore worth while that I should briefly show that this
> "The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 aimed at carrying out the principle of the neutralization of the Panama Canal by subjecting it to the same régime as the Suez Canal. Rules 3, 4, and 5 of article 3 of the treaty are taken almost textually from articles 4, 5, and 6 of the Suez Canal convention of 1888. At the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the Isthmian Canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States. Consequently, there was no need to insert in the draft treaty provisions corresponding to those in articles 10 and 13 of the Suez Canal convention, which preserved the sovereign rights of Turkey. * * *
> "Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection. * * *
> "It has been argued that, as the coastwise trade of the United States is confined to United States vessels, the exemption of vessels engaged in it from the payment of tolls can not injure the interests of foreign nations. It is clear, however, that the interests of foreign nations will be seriously injured in two material respects. * * *
>
> "* * * The exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the coastwise trade in a preferential position as regards other shipping. Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from the east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship, could be sent to its destination more cheaply through the operation of the proposed exemption by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal and then sent on as a coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination on board a foreign vessel. * * *
> "Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade and, consequently, from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining prima facie entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. * * *
> "His Majesty's Government feel no doubt as to the correctness of their interpretation of the treaties of 1850 and 1901 and as to the validity of the rights they claim under them for British shipping. Nor does there seem to them to be any room for doubt that the provisions of the Panama Canal act as to tolls conflict with the rights secured to their shipping by the treaty. But they recognize that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration if the Government of the United States would prefer to take that course.
> "* * * I wish to add before closing this dispatch that it is only with great reluctance that His Majesty's Government have felt bound to raise objections on the ground of treaty rights to the provisions of the act. Animated by an earnest desire to avoid points which might in any way prove embarrassing to the United States, His Majesty's Government have confined their objections in the narrowest possible limits and have recognized in the fullest manner the right of the United States to control the canal * * *."

Can anyone complain of either the substance or tone of this letter? It is a friendly and courteous presentation of a claim by Great Britain under the treaty we sought and largely prepared.

Even those who may not agree with the conclusions expressed by Sir Edward Grey must admit that at least he has ground for the views he expresses, and he presents them in a manner in no way offensive.

I must confess some impatience at the manner in which at times this subject has been presented by the opponents of repeal.

The suggestion that any Senator would surrender the rights of the people of the United States to any country may be effective when presented with highly colored rhetoric to the less thoughtful of our citizens; but the great body of our people are too intelligent to become seriously disturbed by such statements. I can see no occasion for anyone to become excited unless he is a large stockholder in one of the corporations which was expected to receive a subsidy.

The United States Government is really surrendering nothing by the repeal.

The surrender is only made if we fail to make the corporations owning these vessels pay their just part of the expense of the Panama Canal.

Their gain, through the subsidy now allowed, is the loss of all the people.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM AGAINST SUBSIDIES.

Entirely independent of the provisions of the treaty heretofore discussed, the vessels engaged in coastwise traffic should pay tolls at the canal. We will not be frightened because a few conflicting words were slipped into the Democratic platform. The Democratic platform unqualifiedly condemns a subsidy. The policy of the Democratic Party has been fixed for years against ship subsidies. As this will be the consequence of free passage of coastwise traffic through the canal, the provision in the Democratic platform with reference to coastwise vessels should yield to the other provision against subsidies, and the established policy of the party on this subject should prevail. We must select between two conflicting provisions, and may justly conclude that the provision freeing coastwise vessels from paying tolls would not have been placed in the platform if it had been understood that the canal would be opened on a plan which would make such action a subsidy to the corporations owning the coastwise vessels.

The canal belongs to all the people of the United States. The money of all of the people constructed it, and all the people must contribute to pay the interest on the bonds issued for construction and the expenses of maintaining the canal. It is conceded that the interest on the investment, together with the cost of operation and maintenance, will amount to more than $20,000,000 each year. The rates fixed for tolls upon vessels is based upon the theory that by the end of the present decade the tolls will be meeting the interest upon the investment and the expenses of operation. After that time they will furnish a fund to begin paying off the debt and eventually leave the canal owned by the United States with the debt paid. After that time the United States will have the privilege of receiving a profit from the operation of the canal, or by reduced tolls make almost nominal the charges for the passage of vessels through the canal.

THE VALUE OF THE CANAL.

When the question is asked, Why did we build the canal, if we were not to give special advantage to our coastwise vessels? The reply is easy. The canal is a great measure of defense to the United States and to the interests of our people. It will make it practicable to consolidate the Navy of the United States on the Pacific or the Atlantic Ocean. It will reduce the cost of transportation. It will facilitate trade, not alone between the coasts of the United States, but between the coasts of the United States and all parts of America. It will contribute to the growth of all of America outside of the United States by the facilities it affords for ready communication from coast to coast. It can be made self-supporting, and finally a source of profit, and yet bring all these benefits to the United States.

The rates of tolls are fixed at $1.20 per net ton. This is a nautical phrase and comprises a mode of measurement of each vessel. With the rate at $1.20 per net ton nautical measurement the charge per cargo ton upon our coastwise traffic will be from 40 to 80 cents a ton. After paying this charge for passing through the canal, experts have pointed out that the owners of these vessels will still save from $2 to $3 per cargo ton in the cost of transportation from the Atlantic to the Pacific, besides deriving a great benefit from added convenience and time saved.

The canal will thus contribute greatly to the opportunity for coastwise traffic and lessen the expense of coastwise traffic, even though the small charge of from 40 to 80 cents per cargo ton is paid by the owners of the coastwise vessels for being carried through the canal by the Government. It must be borne in mind that in operating the canal it is necessary for officers of the United States to take charge of each vessel, and to carry it through the canal with a crew and with power furnished by the United States. All of this expense attaches to our Government each time a vessel is carried through the canal.

All of the people of the United States have made a great contribution to the owners of the coastwise vessels by the construction of the canal. Why should a further subsidy be given to the owners of these vessels by relieving them of or returning to them the 40 to 80 cents per cargo ton which otherwise they would pay for having their vessels carried through the canal?

It is said that as to all of our other waterways we permit vessels to go through free. The Panama Canal stands in a class to itself. The United States has spent about 700 millions of dollars upon all rivers and harbors and canals, outside of the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal alone will cost over $400,000,000. The money spent in rivers and harbors scatters so generally throughout the entire United States that it is justly claimed all the people receive a benefit, and it would be almost impossible to reach any system of charge.

The Panama Canal, in connection with coastwise traffic, is so situated that the benefits which it will bring will be more peculiarly local, and it will be easy to fix a just plan of charges. Of course, in this I refer to the commercial traffic, not to the benefit to the entire country from the use of the canal as a mode of defense.

We permit foreign-owned vessels to use our harbors and our rivers without charge. We differentiate the Panama Canal from our rivers and harbors by charging tolls against all foreign-owned vessels and by charging all vessels owned by the citizens of the United States engaged in foreign trade, so that we clearly differentiate it from our ports and rivers.

ECONOMICALLY SOUND TO CHARGE COASTWISE VESSELS.

Why should not the owners of the vessels engaged in coastwise traffic bear also their part of the expense of constructing and operating this enterprise? Our coastwise trade is limited by law to vessels owned by citizens of the United States. Foreign-owned or foreign-made vessels can not compete with them for our coastwise traffic. They are already enjoying a great degree of prosperity.

If a suggestion were made to pass a bill to carry the coastwise traffic of the United States over the Panama Railroad without charge, the public would resent it, and yet such a suggestion does not differ greatly from what would be allowed unless we pass the pending bill.

COASTWISE VESSELS ENJOY A MONOPOLY AND NEED NO GOVERNMENT AID.

A recent investigation by the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, together with the report of that committee, goes fully into this subject. Referring to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, the report shows that on this leading waterway of American commerce practically all the large regular steamship lines are either controlled by railroads or are subsidiaries of two large ship consolidations—the Eastern Steamship Corporation or the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines. The report shows that the railroad-controlled lines combined with the lines of these two companies do 93.9 per cent of the total gross tonnage. The report furthermore points out that very few of the principal routes of our entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts are served by more than one regular steamship line.

The report shows clearly that the mode of operating the coastwise traffic of the Atlantic coast leaves no substantial competition between vessel owners. The same is shown to be true, perhaps to a less extent, on the Pacific coast.

Much interesting information has been gathered in this report with reference to the way in which the owners of vessels engaged in coastwise traffic avoid competition between themselves and take advantage of our legislation which excludes them from competition with foreign-owned vessels or foreign-built vessels.

It is perfectly clear that the large corporations engaged in this business are prosperous. They need no subsidy; they are fully able to bear their part of the expense incident to the construction and operation of the Panama Canal. There is no reason why all the people of the United States should pay taxes to put money into the treasuries of these corporations. Those who insist that it is our canal, and we should have the right to let our coastwise vessels go through free, forget that the canal is ours and the money of all the people must pay for it, while the dividends paid by the corporations owning the coastwise vessels are not ours, but go alone to the very small number of men who own stock in them.

But it is claimed that the free passage of these vessels will help commerce from coast to coast, and furnish competition with the transcontinental railroads. If the coastwise vessels will save from $2 to $3 a ton by the use of the canal, even though they pay tolls, this would seem to be a sufficient contribution toward the coastwise trade, and it is hardly possible that the transcontinental railroads will be able to compete with them in the carriage of the class of goods suited to steamboat transportation. Besides, the transcontinental railroads can be regulated and their rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The more I investigate this branch of the subject the less am I impressed with the view that the public will receive benefit, through less transcontinental transportation charges, as a result of giving to the corporations engaged in coastwise traffic the part they should contribute toward the expense and operation of the canal.

Experts who have studied the effect of the canal upon coastwise trade show that little, if any, of the 40 to 80 cents per cargo ton to be charged the coastwise vessels for going through the canal would reach, if remitted, the ultimate consumer, but even if this were not true, the ultimate consumer of cargoes carried by these vessels would make a very small part of the people of our entire country, and it is difficult to justify a tax upon all the people for the benefit of these few.

All of the people of the United States are interested in the commerce with all of the countries of North and South America, and the ultimate consumer of products is concerned with the effect of the canal upon our trade relations with the neighboring countries.

An effort has been made to attract the interest of those zealous for a merchant marine. They should understand that ample vessels are engaged in the coastwise trade, all flying the flag of the United States.

We are short in vessels doing foreign business, where they must compete with the vessels of the world. If a subsidy is to be given to any vessels, it should be given to those engaged in the foreign trade, which need help, not to those engaged in the coastwise trade already protected from foreign competition, already rich and prosperous.

Mr. President, the bill before us, if adopted, only requires the corporations owning vessels engaged in coastwise trade of the United States to pay for having their vessels carried through the canal, just as citizens of the United States must pay for their vessels when engaged in foreign trade and citizens of other countries must pay for their vessels.

The bill carries a proviso that neither the passage of this act nor anything therein contained shall be construed or held as modifying or impairing or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States. The sovereign rights of the United States in the canal zone will be in no way affected.

We have been told that by voting for this bill we are surrendering to British diplomacy. Let us remember the history of British and American diplomacy with reference to the canal.

From no control, by diplomacy we advanced to entire control, only conceding equality of treatment to the subjects of each country. Surely, the United States was not overreached in these negotiations.

When we passed an act granting discriminations in favor of citizens of the United States against subjects of Great Britain, Great Britain called our attention to the treaty and asked for equality of treatment. And added further that as many able men in the United States seemed to doubt that the subjects of Great Britain are entitled to equality of treatment in the use of the canal, Great Britain is ready to submit the construction of this part of the treaty to arbitration. Sir Edward Grey does not suggest The Hague. He suggests arbitration broadly.

In my opinion if two judges of our Supreme Court and two judges of English courts passed upon the subject the probabilities all are that the unanimous verdict would be under the treaty that citizens of Great Britain and citizens of the United States are to receive equal treatment.

The question of the sovereignty of the United States over the Canal Zone is in no way involved. With complete sovereignty and without a treaty obligation, according to the fixed policy heretofore of the United States, there should be no discrimination against the citizens of either country.

The construction of the canal does rank among the world's wonders, but if in connection with its construction we should seek to violate the terms of a treaty made at our own instance, we would subject our country to the just suspicion of all other nations, and commit a colossal blunder.

Well might the President of the United States feel that for this country to disregard its obligation of equality of treatment to citizens of other countries passing their commerce through the canal would create a general distrust of the United States and hinder him in dealing "with matters of even greater delicacy."

No matter how serious the consequences, we should live up to our treaties.

It is fortunate in the present instance that we can live up to the fullest measure of this treaty and cause no loss to the United States or her citizens. By every rule of sound diplomacy and common sense we should extend the doctrine of equality of treatment to citizens of all countries at the canal, and we should make the coastwise vessels pay their part of the expense of building and operating the canal. By following in this instance the tradition.' policy of the United States we will at the same time show our regard for agreements, add to the prosperity of our people at home and to the standing of our country among the nations of the world.

[Senate Document No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY OF APRIL 19, 1850.

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the river San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States, and Her Britannic Majesty on the Right Hon. Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, a member of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council, knight commander of the most honorable Order of the Bath and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty to the United States, for the aforesaid purpose; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

"ARTICLE 2.

"Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

"ARTICLE 3.

"In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local government or governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used or to be used for that object shall be protected from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

"ARTICLE 4.

"The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise with any State, States, or governments possessing or claiming to possess any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse, or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such States or governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power. And furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The contracting parties further engage that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof so that the said canal may forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government, if both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guarantee without first giving six months' notice to the other.

"ARTICLE 6.

"The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every State with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal, and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

"ARTICLE 7.

"It being desirable that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain determine to give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, with the necessary capital, the consent of the local authorities, and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention; and if any persons or company should already have, with any State through which the proposed ship canal may pass, a contract for the construction of such a canal as that specified in this convention, to the stipulations of which contract neither of the contracting parties in this convention have any just cause to object, and the said persons or company shall moreover have made preparations, and expended time, money, and trouble, on the faith of such contract, it is hereby agreed that such persons or company shall have a priority of claim over every other person, persons, or company to the protection of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and be allowed a year from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention for concluding their arrangements, and presenting evidence of sufficient capital subscribed to accomplish the contemplated undertaking; it being understood that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid period, such persons or company be not able to commence and carry out the proposed enterprise, then the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be free to afford their protection to any other persons or company that shall be prepared to commence and proceed with the construction of the canal in question.

"ARTICLE 8.

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

"ARTICLE 9.

"The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from this day, or sooner if possible.

"In faith whereof we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed our seals.

"Done at Washington the 19th day of April, A. D. 1850.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible, but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires to address the Senate on this subject at this time, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Agricultural appropriation bill may be taken up.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to address the Senate upon this subject for about 20 minutes. My remarks will be short; they will only bear on one particular matter; and if it will not inconvenience the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I would prefer not to have the unfinished business laid aside at this time. However, if it will inconvenience him for me to proceed now, I can speak on some other day.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to press the Agricultural appropriation bill, as the naval appropriation bill, I believe, has come in, and the legislative appropriation bill will soon be reported from the committee; but, as the Senator limits his time to 20 or 30 minutes, of course I would not feel like denying the Senate the pleasure of hearing him at this juncture.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire at this time to enter upon an extended discussion of the subject which has been so thoroughly discussed from time to time, but only to call attention to one particular matter to which reference has been had in almost all of the speeches which thus far have been made, and that is to the Welland Canal—the terms of the Welland Canal treaty—and the light a discussion of it may throw upon the vital portions of the treaty which is up for construction. I am led to discuss this particular matter at this time, particularly because the Senator who has just taken his seat has referred to it.

The Welland Canal treaty in article 27 provides as follows:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the Government of the United States engages that the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

It will be observed at once how plain and distinct, how specific the language of article 27 is with reference to insuring equality of treatment and equality of use between the inhabitants of the respective countries. There seems to be really no room for construction; and it has always been somewhat a matter of surprise to me that Hay and Pauncefote, having this treaty before them and, of course, both being familiar with it, if they designed to accomplish beyond question and in unmistakable terms the same equality of treatment in connection with the Panama Canal, did not use the language which was used here, because there can be no possible room for construction when you come to analyze its language. It says "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion" and "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States." It would seem to leave no room for a fair difference of opinion. The language is quite different from the general terms or language used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

If we had in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the provision of this article, that the Panama Canal should be open upon terms of equality to the inhabitants of the United States and to the inhabitants of Great Britain, naming the two countries, we would unquestionably not be here discussing this subject matter.

It is an entirely different proposition to have a provision in a treaty which provides for the free and equal use to all nations observing certain rules, which certain rules are incapable of observance by one of the signatory powers, as we claim, and providing specifically that it should be free and open to the inhabitants of the respective countries, and naming the countries.

It was not that particular phase of it, however, to which I was going to call attention. It was to the construction which Great Britain placed upon the language of the Welland Canal treaty, and which Great Britain still continues to place upon the language of the Welland Canal treaty. The Welland Canal treaty or the treaty of 1871, neither in its language nor in the construction which the British Government placed upon it, can offer any comfort to those advocating repeal. The language is infinitely more specific than the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and yet the British Government contended and now contends that she had a right under it to discriminate in favor of her own trade and commerce.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], when discussing this subject upon the 21st day of January, 1913, in the speech which has since become famous in this discussion, after reading Mr. Cleveland's message under date of August 23, 1888, said:

> Upon the representations of the United States embodying that view, Canada retired from the position which she had taken, rescinded the provision for differential tolls, and put American trade going to American markets on the same basis of tolls as Canadian trade going to Canadian markets. She did not base her action upon any idea that there was no competition between trade to American ports and trade to Canadian ports, but she recognized the law of equality in good faith and honor; and to this day that law is being accorded to us and by each great nation to the other.

As a matter of fact, historically speaking, England and Canada did not yield upon the deliverance of the message of President Cleveland. It was not upon the occasion of the matter being thus called to the attention of England and Canada that they finally conceded the position which we now claim is the right position. The British Government never recognized, and has not until this hour recognized, the law of equality in good faith and honor with reference to that canal treaty. I call attention also to the language of Sir Edward Grey, which is quite similar in its import to the language used by the Senator from New York in regard to this same subject matter:

> Your excellency will no doubt remember how strenuously the United States protested, as a violation of equal rights, against a system which Canada had introduced of a rebate of a large portion of the tolls on certain freight on the Welland Canal, provided that such freight was taken as far as Montreal, and how, in the face of that protest, the system was abondoned.

The inference fairly to be drawn from both of those statements is that upon the filing of the protest Great Britain and Canada, seeing the error of their construction of the treaty, yielded their position and, as a matter of equity and as a matter of national honor, conceded the position which we had taken with regard to it. But such is not true, and no such inference can be drawn from the real facts.

What are the real facts in regard to the matter? In the first place, Mr. Cleveland delivered his message on the 23d day of August, 1888, in which he said:

> By article 27 of the treaty of 1871 provision was made to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and to also secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.
> The equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion which we were promised in the use of the canals of Canada did not secure to us freedom from tolls in their navigation, but we had a right to expect that we, being Americans and interested in American commerce, would be no more burdened in regard to the same than Canadians engaged in their own trade; and the whole spirit of the concession made was, or should have been, that merchandise and property transported to an American market through these canals should not be enhanced in its cost by tolls many times higher than such as were carried to an adjoining Canadian market. All our citizens, producers and consumers as well as vessel owners, were to enjoy the equality promised.
> And yet evidence has for some time been before the Congress, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that while the tolls charged in the first instance are the same to all, such vessels and cargoes as are destined to certain Canadian ports—
> Their coastwise trade—
> are allowed a refund of nearly the entire tolls, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage.
> To promise equality and then in practice make it conditional upon our vessels doing Canadian business instead of their own, is to fulfill a promise with the shadow of performance.

Nothing was done during Mr. Cleveland's administration on the part of Canada and Great Britain, and no consideration, further than the mere promise upon their part to consider it, was ever given to this message which was supposed to have brought about the change. The matter remained precisely the same, Great Britain contending all the time that the plain language of the treaty to which I have called attention was not being violated. When Mr. Harrison came into the presidency he again called attention to the plain terms of the treaty, and again there was no response on the part of Canada or Great Britain in the matter of yielding the construction for which we contended. Finally the United States passed what is known as the retaliatory statute, through and by means of which we imposed certain charges upon her vessels passing through our canals, and in that way retaliated for the charges which Canada was making. Never until that retaliatory statute was passed—and it became a matter of pecuniary concern and protection to her own commerce—did she yield upon the proposition, and not then as to the construction of the treaty.

When they finally yielded upon this proposition they said—and this now remains upon the files as part of the archives of the State Department:

> Every obligation of the treaty has been fully and unreservedly met.

The contention that they were not justified in adopting the tolls rebate was met by the proposition that they were entitled to do so under the terms of the treaty. They further say:

> The difference of opinion which exists as to the treaty rights of the two countries is to be regretted, but it forms no ground for a charge that either country in maintaining its own views proceeds with a disregard of solemn obligations.

Now, place the language of the treaty of 1871, article 27, alongside the language of the treaty of 1901, article 3, rule 1, and then take the British construction and her final protest and it will be seen that under that specific language she claimed for herself the right of discrimination, while now, under language, to say the least, far more general, far more favorable to the United States she contends against discrimination.

Why did Canada yield upon this proposition? Certainly as a matter of business, to protect her commerce, leaving upon file with the Secretary of State the asseveration that her construction of the treaty was right and is right; and that contention stands upon the part of Great Britain and Canada to-day. In the face of the claim that we are construing this language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty unfairly, we have the declaration upon the part of Great Britain, now on file and not withdrawn, that the plain, unmistakable language of the Welland treaty was correctly construed in a way which enabled her to favor her coastwise traffic.

I simply desire to put in the RECORD the facts, because the construction of the Welland Canal treaty, if it is to be received at all, must be received as a construction unfavorable to the contention which Great Britain at this time is making.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. I understood the Senator to say that Canada attempted to favor her coastwise traffic. My understanding of her position in the matter was that she favored any traffic going to a certain port. Is that correct, or not?

Mr. BORAH. My understanding is that Canada charged the same toll for all traffic, and then rebated to her——

Mr. HUGHES. And then rebated, not to her people, but to anybody that carried the traffic to a certain port?

Mr. BORAH. To a Canadian port.

Mr. HUGHES. To a certain port, regardless of whose traffic it was?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but there was a rebate when the vessel was carrying commerce to her ports.

Mr. HUGHES. To certain of her ports?

Mr. BORAH. Any ports.

Mr. HUGHES. And that rebate was given to any vessel that carried it, as I understand. I ask for information.

Mr. BORAH. That is not my understanding.

Mr. HUGHES. That any vessel, whether a Canadian vessel or American vessel or other vessel, that carried commerce to this port received the same treatment. In other words, it was an attempt to discriminate in favor of a port, and not an attempt to discriminate in favor of the commerce, as I understand—her own commerce or anybody else's.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not so understand it.

Mr. HUGHES. That is my understanding from every statement that I have heard made here, and I wanted to get it cleared up if I could.

Mr. BORAH. I have a different understanding, but I may be in error about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it was certain ports.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether the threat of retaliatory legislation was not made, and to some extent carried into effect, before Great Britain yielded her position as a matter of practice, and gave the actual operation of the treaty the construction that was contended for by our Government?

Mr. BORAH. That is correct. On June 20, 1892, President Harrison sent a message to Congress stating that nothing had been done by Canada in response to our request in connection with the treaty, and recommending legislation. An act was passed July 26, 1892, allowing tolls to be placed upon Canadian commerce passing through the American canal at the Soo. A proclamation was issued by the President August 20, 1892, fixing the tolls. By Canadian order in council, issued February 13, 1893, the tolls were removed from American traffic; and on February 21, 1893, our order fixing tolls on Canadian traffic was suspended. It is plainly to be seen that the only thing that brought about the settlement was the retaliatory legislation.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it not true that there is a great disproportion of favors in any comparison between American and Canadian traffic? Does the Senator think we are in any shape to retaliate against a nation which has so little traffic, as compared with our own traffic, both being affected?

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand that there is a great difference.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that there is a tremendous disproportion between the amount of Canadian traffic going through these canals and the amount of our own traffic.

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that if he will examine the records in regard to this matter and the correspondence and the negotiations which followed the passage of this retaliatory legislation, I am satisfied that he will arrive at the conclusion that the concession came as a result of the legislation, and that when Canada receded the United States suspended the operation of the statute which had been passed for the purpose of enforcing the retaliation.

I will conclude by putting in the RECORD, in order that it be there for purposes of comparison, the provision of the treaty which we are now asked to construe. I have read the provision from the Welland Canal treaty. The portion to which I wish to call attention, of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in some respects I am afraid the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is an illustration of the truth of the old couplet from Samuel Butler's Hudibras concerning people who—

> Compound for sins they are inclined to,
> By damning those they have no mind to.

After denouncing the bad faith of Canada, the Senator insinuates that as an argument for our making a like interpretation based on the bare letter of a treaty in our own favor. It is true he says that the language of the Welland Canal treaty was much more specific and unmistakable than the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In that, however, he is mistaken again, because the Hay-Pauncefote treaty brings forward article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and by reference makes it a part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and the language of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in article 8 is even more specific than the language of the Welland Canal treaty.

The Welland Canal treaty uses the language "inhabitants of Canada and of the United States." Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, brought forward by reference and made a part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as much as if literally repeated, uses the language "the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States," and demand equal treatment of both by forbidding discrimination. It could not be any more specific.

As to the trouble we had with Canada about the Welland Canal treaty, the Senator from Idaho is historically accurate in every statement he has made. We took the position at that time that Canada was interpreting a treaty in a totally unjustifiable way for the purpose of making a discrimination in favor of her own commerce as against American commerce. While she and Great Britain did not admit that that was the case, the final upshot of the whole thing—after diplomacy, threats, retaliatory legislation, and all—was that Canada withdrew from an untenable position—it makes no difference why it was untenable—and the two nations fixed a modus vivendi whereby each extended to the other freedom from tolls.

Mr. President, Canada's attempted bad faith, keeping of an agreement, the letter which kills and violating the spirit which saves, can not possibly be an argument in connection with this matter, unless, indeed, it be an argument against our imitating her example by waiting for retaliatory measures before voluntarily undoing our own wrong. My interpretation of the Welland Canal treaty, if I had been called upon to give one at the time, the interpretation of the treaty by the American Government, the interpretation of its terms by the Senator from Idaho, all tend to the conclusion that Canada was acting in bad faith and was trying to evade the provisions of the treaty—keeping it to the eye and violating it to the faith. In other words, she was complying literally with the treaty, complying with the letter of the treaty, and violating its spirit. In yet other words, she was not making a discrimination against American vessels and vessel owners, and therefore she contended that a rebate upon freight carried to a Canadian port was not a violation of the letter of the treaty, although it was a discrimination against American ports, and therefore against commerce; and, therefore, as Cleveland said, fulfilling a solemn promise by a shadow of performance. She was doing just what is sought to have us do here.

We have done by legislation a certain thing that is not a violation of the letter of this Hay-Pauncefote treaty, according to my interpretation of it; but when we go back and examine the res gestæ, if I may use that phrase, by analogy we find out that the minds of the American diplomats and the minds of the British diplomats came to a common understanding, and that common understanding we are now asked to violate. That common understanding is vouched for by White, vouched for by Choate, vouched for by Lansdowne, vouched for by Hay in a communication sent and read to the Senate and in conversation with Senator LODGE—vouched for by everybody who then represented us—and that understanding is the interpretation now contended for by Great Britain. A majority of the Senators who voted upon this question two years ago did not know all this contemporaneous correspondence—this res gestæ. I, for one, did not.

Mr. President, if I through my agent and you through your agent effect a contract with one another, and if those agents have an understanding—an admitted coming together of minds—as to what the contract means, even though it be awkwardly or doubtfully worded, and if that understanding is communicated to you as one principal and communicated to me as another principal, and we accept the contract as written with the understanding of its meaning thus held by both agents at the time, and thus communicated to both principals, then I understand that either you or I might go into a court subsequently and might say, "This contract is susceptible of a different interpretation. I choose to give it that interpretation. I stand upon the letter right in the case." I can understand that, but I can not understand how any man in the world would ever have any confidence in whichever one of us did it. If you had done that, I never would enter into another contract with you where anything was left to your honor or where anything was left to your observance of good faith, independently of the very letter of the contract, enforceable in the courts of law. I would go further; and fearing, even in such a case, that you might dispute, if you could, I would provide that you should pay damages and attorneys' fees in case of litigation, so much would I distrust you. Moreover, from my justified distrust, all your other neighbors would learn to distrust you and thereafter to treat you accordingly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Did I understand the Senator to take the position that the agents negotiating the treaty could communicate to one another their views of what the treaty was, and that their views would govern rather than the language of the treaty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, no. I did not say that, nor did I say anything upon that subject; but what I said and will say now is this: Where there is room for misunderstanding concerning a treaty, it is perfectly permissible to take up the letters exchanged between the diplomats, the foreign office in Great Britain and the Secretary of State here, and the diplomats who were representing them and their communications to each other and to their respective principals, as things shedding light upon the real understanding, the real thing intended to be agreed to—the real coming together of minds contemporaneous with the event. I say that White and Choate and Lansdowne and all of them have agreed that what this treaty was meant to do was to bring about an equality of treatment between British subjects and American citizens and British ships and American and other ships, and that that was their understanding of what the language used meant, and that Secretary Hay, in a communication which was read to the Senate, put the Senate as well upon notice of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not think I was mistaken as to what the Senator said. The Senator contends that by reason of the understanding which Hay and White and Lansdowne and Innes and a few others had this treaty should be construed in the light of their understanding?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; where doubt exists. Where no doubt exists from the language, of course that is different.

Mr. BORAH. But suppose I have no doubt about it. Suppose I entertain no doubt about it. I am not bound to accept their view of it, then?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, if the Senator entertains no doubt about it, and if he thinks the language of the treaty is such that no doubt can be entertained, the Senator votes here in the Senate upon his honor and upon his responsibility to his own sense of intellectual integrity, and nobody would have the slightest right in the world to criticize him. It would seem queer to assert, however, that language concerning the meaning of which all of us are debating can be a subject of no doubt as to the proper interpretation. That is not the point, however.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In a moment. I am talking about what the treaty meant to those who made it at the time it was concluded; and I have just called attention to the fact that a certain interpretation of the language which our free-tolls law violates is reenforced by the fact that it was so understood and admitted by all the participating parties at the time, and further reenforced by the fact that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is brought forward by reference and incorporated as a part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that the language of article 8 is specific and indubitable.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the position of the Senator is correct, that in construing treaties we must take into consideration the understanding of the negotiators, as evidenced by the correspondence between them, does it not follow that the Senate never should approve any treaty until it has examined the correspondence and has found from the correspondence what the real treaty is?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, what I said, I thought, was plain enough—that where there was a doubt, or where language used by the contracting parties was subject to a double construction, it was permissible, in order to find out what the real coming together of minds was, as intended by the language, to consider the diplomatic negotiations and the letters of our Secretary of State and the letters of the head of the British foreign office in the archives in our State Department relating to the negotiation itself, and especially such as discusses the meaning of the debated language itself. Of course that does not apply where the language is so plain that there is no doubt of its meaning as written, whether it was written by mistake or not; but where a double construction is possible that rule of interpretation does apply. By the way, the Senate has the right always to call for all the diplomatic correspondence leading up to the completion of a treaty, and if it does not do so and any misunderstanding or mistake is entailed by the omission to do so it is its own fault.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, I do not know how that rule could be safely applied. A treaty is submitted here to the Senate. A Senator upon the floor reads the language and arrives at a conclusion as to its meaning. He has no doubt as to his conclusion, because he deals alone with the language before him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yielded for a question. I do not care to be kept upon the floor.

Mr. REED. He leans alone upon the language before him. Now, if every time a doubt thereafter arises we are to settle it by the correspondence which the Senator I am using in the illustration never saw, does it not follow that the only safe thing to do is for everybody to read all the correspondence?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, of course that is a good rule. If you can get it—and you always can where you have any doubt—very well. In this particular case, however, our Secretary of State sent the information to the Senate upon an inquiry directed to him and the Senate got it, and those Senators who chose to listen heard it read in executive session; and there is no pretense that the Senate was ignorant of just what the Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, thought was meant by the treaty.

Now, of course if the Senator and I would enter into a written contract and expressed something which neither one of us intended to express and expressed it so plainly it could not be denied, that is another proposition; but wherever there is a doubt patent upon the face of the record that doubt can be settled only by appealing to the understanding of time. That is a familiar rule of construction even in constitutional questions. The Supreme Court several times has resorted to it. Where some phrase of the Constitution was capable of a doubtful construction the Supreme Court has gone back to the contemporaneous debates of the time in the constitutional convention and the State conventions, where was discussed the particular point at issue in order to determine what the men who used the debated language meant by it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Following the line of thought which the Senator last expressed, the Senate was a party to this treaty. Would the Senator follow it so far as to say that the understanding of Senators when they voted upon the treaty should also be taken into consideration in determining what the treaty meant?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I would. The understanding of all parties at the time ought to be taken into consideration, and the understanding of each in proportion to his opportunity to know and his intimacy with the negotiation and his participation in it given due weight.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, the understanding of some Members of the Senate does not bear out the understanding which seems to have been developed in the Senator's mind by the correspondence to which he refers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, wherever you come to examine the res gestæ, as I called it by analogy; and you honestly draw one inference from it and I another. That raises a different question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not an inference; it is a fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not a fact at all. It is an inference, after all, as to what the meaning of the language is and what the understanding was. I draw from it the thought that we agreed at that time to abide by the language of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and that that language has none of the ambiguity in it which the expressed language of this treaty would have had without referring to it, because article 8 says that there shall be no discrimination between "the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of what the Senator from Mississippi has said about the treaty as to the Welland Canal and the attempted evasion of it, although keeping the letter of the treaty—evading the intent—what would the Senator say about the proposition that has been stated, at least informally, several times that, while we might not have the right to exempt from tolls a coastwise vessel of the United States passing through the canal, we might have the right to pay as a subsidy to that vessel at stated periods the amount of the tolls which it had paid to the Government for passage?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad the Senator mentioned that. I believe that, if done with the intent and with the effect of relieving our vessels and our commerce from the tolls paid by others, would be a mere evasion, a violation by indirection; and that would meet my approval no more than a violation by direction. In that connection I want to say that during the course of this argument it has been said that many of the countries of Europe now make appropriations out of their treasuries to pay the tolls for the ships passing through the Suez Canal, and that we may look forward to their doing something of that kind in connection with the tolls of the ships passing through the Panama Canal. If they do, they will be attempting to evade and, by indirection, to violate our rules for the management of the canal under this treaty, and they will be showing bad faith to us as nonobservers of the spirit and intent of those rules made in accordance with the requirements of the treaty. If they do that, it will be time enough for us to handle the question when they do it; and whenever that difficulty shall present itself to the Congress of the United States, I think there will be no doubt about our handling it sufficiently. A sufficient way to handle it would be to add to the tolls paid by any ship the amount contributed to it by its Government in payment or repayment of tolls.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in that way we would restore the equality of treatment of all, so that no foreign power could destroy our right and our treaty obligation to prevent discrimination in the use of the canal in favor of any.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. What obligation has Italy or Germany or any of those nations not to return the tolls which their ships pay in the way of rebate or a refund?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have no treaty obligation at all; but when they pass through that canal which we have been given the right to construct under certain conditions by Panama, under which we have agreed and they promised to observe our rules for the use of the canal, as a condition of its use by them they become a party consenting to our rules and bound in good faith by them as much as if they had formally agreed to abide by whatever we did in connection with it. They know that it is our object and our duty under the treaty, subject to which our rules are made, to treat the commerce of all countries equally and without discrimination, and if they attempt by legislation of their own to destroy that equality of treatment and equality of benefit so far as their own vessels are concerned, then we will have the right, although they are not parties to the treaty, to restore the equality by making the tolls amount to the ordinary tolls plus whatever any Government appropriates to its vessels, with hope of special and exceptional benefit and with intent to secure it in violation of our treaty obligation both to Panama and to Great Britain. I think I may go further and say that we would have the right, if that was the only way to secure equality of treatment to "all nations," to cut off from the use of the canal any nation refusing to "observe" in letter and substantially in practical effect and spirit the rules laid down by us, chief of which always is the rule of equal use for all and special or discriminating benefit to none.

Mr. BORAH. Neither England signing the treaty nor any other Government is under any obligation to treat the United States fairly in this matter at all. This is a unilateral contract, so far as the question of equal treatment is concerned. England could go to work and build a canal across another portion of the Isthmus to-day and charge the United States all she might see fit to charge. There is no obligation upon her part to treat the commerce of the United States with equality, and she promises nothing—she is free; we are bound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If she built another canal? Yes; in that event.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But there is a contract as to this canal and an obligation on her part to help us when we treat the commerce of the world equally, and there is an obligation, although not a treaty obligation, upon every nation which uses that canal to use it in good faith, "observing" our rules.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Now we are dealing with the treaty before us, and there is nothing in the treaty—no language, no phrase—which would obligate England or any other nation not to refund her tolls or treat us fairly in that respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To do what?

Mr. BORAH. To treat us with fairness, equality, and so forth. They can refund every dollar of the tolls which their ships pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if they do, we can increase the amount of tolls so as to restore the equality.

Mr. BORAH. We can not do it under the terms of the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I contend that we can and ought. That brings me to another matter before I take my seat. This is not a unilateral contract, as the Senator from Idaho calls it, but it is a trilateral contract, to say the very least of it. We took the very strip of land in Panama by treaty as a conditional grant from Panama, and we can not morally and in good faith use it, and we have no title to it, except subject to the conditions of the grant, and the Panama treaty with us made the Hay-Pauncefote treaty a part of itself.

Mr. BORAH. But not a consideration, which affects the title.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, yes. It goes to the very root and initiative of our title. So the trilateral contract exists between Great Britain, Panama, and the United States. It is true that Great Britain is not in any way responsible for the management of the canal, because she has no part or parcel in its management, but she is bound by the terms of the treaty. So is Panama. So are we.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator from Mississippi takes his seat, do I understand it to be the position of the Senator from Mississippi that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, if Germany or France or England paid a subsidy to its ships of commerce equivalent to the tolls which were exacted by the United States, that would be a violation of the treaty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, it would not be a violation on their part of the treaty if they were not parties to it. No party can violate a treaty who is not a party to it. But it might under certain circumstances be a violation of the treaty on our part to submit and consent to their act.

Now, what is done in the Suez Canal situation? We will get things down to the real point. The Austrian Government, for example, makes an appropriation to pay its ships what they have paid as tolls in the Suez Canal. If any country does that as to the Panama Canal, then we, under our treaty with Great Britain, are compelled, or it is our duty, as I see it, not only to our own people and to our own commerce but a duty to Great Britain and her commerce under the treaty, to restore the real equality by making the tolls such that a discrimination thus caused shall not continue, and the only way we can do that is by adding to the tolls in a case like that just what Austria pays or agrees by law to repay to her ships.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the Senator's position would be, nevertheless, that Germany or France would be perfectly at liberty to give these subsidies, while the United States, if it undertook to give a subsidy to its own ships equivalent to the amount of tolls, would be violating the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator has gone back to his original language. Of course I must take his statement upon that ground. There is nothing in this treaty that prevents the United States or anybody else from passing a law to give a ship subsidy; in other words, a general ship subsidy. But I was talking about a special case, where they remitted the canal tolls. That is the contention suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], with which he did not agree. When you come to the question whether there is anything in the treaty to keep Austria or Italy or Great Britain or the United States themselves, even, or any nation, from passing a ship-subsidy law, of course there is not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But what I am asking the Senator now is whether, in his opinion, it would be a violation of the treaty upon the part of the United States if the United States granted a subsidy equivalent in amount to the amount of toll that these American ships paid?

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the intention and with the effect of giving free passage to our ships, or a part of them? The Senator means that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, the Senator puts it that way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That undoubtedly would be an evasion, in my opinion, of the spirit of the treaty, and an indirect violation of it as reprehensible as any direct violation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the United States has tied its hands in such a way that it can not encourage its merchant marine so far as that would be an encouragement, while it has left every other nation in the world free to encourage its merchant marine hereafter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator means that the United States has tied its hands so that it can not encourage its merchant marine, it has tied its hands only against subsidizing its ships in a specified way—that is, by remission of canal tolls, or what is in spirit the same thing—repayment of them. Just that far, too, and no farther, have we the right, as the manager and owner of this canal, to "tie the hands" of any other nation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Every other nation can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It can subsidize its merchant marine and build it up in any other way—in any way, in fact—which is not violative of this or some other treaty.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States has surrendered a part of its sovereign power?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not intend to make a speech. I will just say a few words about that since the Senator has brought it in. Of all the enfantillage that has been uttered in connection with this debate that stands easily chief. It is not even original with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I would not claim originality in a Chamber where the Senator from Mississippi sits.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, pshaw! You might just as well say that when the United States enters into a treaty with Great Britain about its fisheries or about fisheries generally, or when it enters into a treaty with some country about aliens from that country, it has surrendered a part of its sovereignty. There never was a treaty made since the world began, not even a reciprocity treaty, that did not surrender some natural right of both nations entering into the treaty. Now, a natural right in international relations is the right to have your own way, to announce your own purpose, and to get it by war if necessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment. Every treaty of commerce ever entered into from the Jay treaty down to now, if kept in good faith, in some way shackled and limited the power of free action of our own Government; and in that very remote way was a limitation upon our sovereignty and upon that of the other high contracting powers. Every time you make a treaty of peace at the end of a war, as far as that is concerned, you agree not to do something which without the treaty you could have done; and if you wish to be numbered among the faith-keeping nations of the earth you must to that extent frequently limit your activities, and in that remote sense, and in that only, "surrender your sovereignty," if you choose to call what you have done by so absurdly inapplicable a phrase. In other words, every time a nation of the earth says to another, "I will agree to this, provided you agree to that," both nations have surrendered something which without the treaty they would not have surrendered. But as entering into a treaty is also an act of sovereignty, you exchange your freedom of sovereign action, as to what you surrender, in consideration of the benefit which, by the exercise of sovereignty in making the treaty, you acquire.

One might as well say that if I agree to quit smoking I surrender my individual liberty and independence. I only exercise the former and assert the latter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a minute. Another thought. You speak as if at the time of this treaty we were the grantors. We are not.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You speak of it as if we had had a certain limited territory down there in Panama which belonged to us in fee simple, without any conditions of any description, when, as a fact, the very deed, which was the treaty which transferred the strip to us, did it under the most solemn conditions with which you must comply if we regard the sanctity of international faith.

Now, nations that do not respect inviolate the sanctity of their treaties invite the aggressions, as well as the contempt, of all the world. In that certain sense, of course, when we entered into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we did surrender a part of our sovereignty, by asserting another part of it, if you mean by sovereignty unrestrained freedom of national action without international obligation by voluntary treaty limitation of action.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I want to have the Senator admit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a matter of fact, we have surrendered no real sovereignty at all. You intend the American people to believe that somehow or other we have surrendered that which is a part of our independence and of our national life. We have done nothing of the sort, and nobody believes that we have.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as the courts are concerned, so far as legislation is concerned, we are just as fully sovereign upon the Panama Canal as we are anywhere else in any other territory of the United States; but so far as the use of the canal is concerned, we are not free and untrammeled and independent of the balance of the world, because we have voluntarily contracted by solemn treaty to manage and control it without discrimination.

Mr. BORAH. Yet, Mr. President, what——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The title rests on treaty and is an international title and not a national title at all. Yet what? [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will continue to warn the occupants of the galleries as to the rules of the Senate. Manifestations are not permitted.

Mr. BORAH. Yet, Mr. President, that country over which the sovereignty of the United States has been extended is one of the most vital and important pieces of territory that the United States owns. Now, if our sovereignty over that territory is limited in any respect whatever, to the extent that it is limited we have parted with that sovereignty, have we not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not limited in any respect except as to our management of the canal, and in that respect only by our voluntary contractual act, which was itself an act of sovereignty, and it is limited especially in this respect, that in managing it we shall so manage it that there shall be equal treatment for all nations, and so that we shall comply with article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which promises no discrimination between vessels and commerce of British subjects and American citizens; and by article 4, I believe it is, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which extends this obligation of non-discrimination to the vessels "of all nations observing the rules" laid down by us.

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President, just a moment. If we had no treaty with Great Britain and had built that canal upon the territory as it there exists at this time, there would be no doubt that we could send our vessels through that canal free if we desired?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; if we had no treaty with Great Britain, or Panama either, and owned the strip unconditionally.

Mr. BORAH. Both our local commerce and our over-sea commerce. Now, the power to control the commerce of the country is an exercise of sovereignty. If we have parted with our right to control that commerce we have parted with a most essential and vital portion of our national sovereignty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; if that is sovereignty and if the case of no treaty supposed by you existed in fact. If you entered into a commercial treaty with Great Britain, you would have parted with certain rights.

Mr. BORAH. I submit to the Senator that if we parted with the right we parted with a portion of our sovereignty, and I understood the Senator to say that that position was the most puerile ever uttered in the Senate of the United States, or something to that effect. Yet the Senator will admit that we have parted with a portion of our sovereignty if the construction of the treaty which the Senator makes be correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I used the word "enfantillage" in connection with that argument. I was using it because there was intended to be conveyed by argument the impression that we surrendered a part of our real sovereignty, not a mere freedom to act. The people at large, when you talk about "surrendering" a part of "the sovereignty of the United States," think we have somehow or other crippled the United States as an independent, free nation upon the surface of the earth. I said that of course this treaty, like all treaties, does to a certain extent hamper the free and independent activity of both contracting parties. Now, undoubtedly if the United States had owned the strip at Panama just as it owns the Florida Peninsula and had cut a canal across it, it would have had the right to have charged whatever it pleased and to refuse to charge anything to whomsoever it pleased. It would have had a right to treat the matter as of purely domestic concern, which it would have been. But the fallacy is that you insist on treating the Panama Canal as a purely domestic concern, when your very title is international and not national, and when the very grant by which you hold this strip is a grant with conditions, and an international grant and international conditions at that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The canal strip could not have been unconditionally acquired and the canal built, except at the end of a war, without entering into an international agreement with international conditions. Undoubtedly we could not have taken it away from Panama or from Colombia without a war; possibly, though not probably, war also with Great Britain for violation of another treaty. The only way we had to get the strip at all was to get it under an international agreement with conditions, and the conditions are written in the agreement, which was the treaty.

Do not forget all the time that the Panama Canal makes the Hay-Pauncefote treaty a part of itself and its observance a part of the Panama grant. Panama is the grantor, we only the grantee. Another Senator said something about abrogating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Senator from Georgia has very properly stated this morning that if you did you would abrogate your title to the canal strip.

Mr. BORAH. I disagree with both the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Georgia on that proposition. It is no part of the consideration of the transfer of the canal property. It never was and never was intended to be. The abrogation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty upon any proper grounds would not affect our title.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that to follow his line of reasoning with reference to the impairment of American sovereignty because of the fact that we have parted with our rights to let our ships go through the canal free, the Senator will admit that if his construction of the canal treaty is a correct one we are still bound to make equal charges against all other nations but ourselves. If the Senator's construction of the treaty is correct, it compels us to hold the scales equally between all other nations except ourselves.

Mr. BORAH. Observing the rules which we established.

Mr. HUGHES. All nations observing the rules. Is it not parting with sovereignty to admit that we have not the right to let any ships go through free? I do not suppose the Senator concedes it.

Mr. BORAH. We look upon the question of sovereignty in an entirely different way.

As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is anxious to proceed with the appropriation bill, I will not take up further time.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. JONES. Has the unfinished business been laid aside?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] asked that it be laid aside.

Mr. THORNTON. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that it was coupled with the statement if no other Senator wished to address the Senate at that time, but other Senators did take the floor, and the moment it is concluded I wish to renew my request.

Mr. JONES. I simply wish to make a request before the unfinished business is laid aside.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, before the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside I wish to make a brief statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I will not occupy more than five or six minutes.

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some figures in connection with the argument made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the reason why Great Britain yielded in the Welland Canal controversy is because of the retaliatory measures put into effect by the United States. An examination of the records shows that the traffic even through the Canadian canals is exceedingly disproportionate and that any retaliatory measures the United States could possibly contemplate or put into effect would not operate to the injury of the Canadian traffic nearly so much as it would operate to the injury and damage of American traffic.

The figures show that in 1908 through the Canadian canals the percentage of Canadian commerce was 28.7 per cent and of American 71.3 per cent.

In 1909 the Canadian traffic was 21.8 per cent and the American traffic 78.2 per cent.

In 1910 the Canadian traffic was 18.3 per cent and the American traffic 81.7 per cent.

In 1911 the Canadian traffic was 20.5 per cent and the American traffic 79.5 per cent.

In 1912 the Canadian traffic was 19.7 per cent and the American traffic 80.3 per cent.

In 1913 the Canadian traffic was 21.3 per cent and the American traffic 78.7 per cent.

It seems to me that that disposes conclusively of the argument of the Senator from Idaho that it was not because England came to the conclusion that she had been wrong about her treaty that she yielded, but because of the threatened retaliatory measures on the part of the United States.

I will state that the figures which I have read were given by a gentleman from whose argument the Senator also was quoting, I think, although the gentleman arrives at a different conclusion than the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. From whom was the Senator reading?

Mr. HUGHES. I was reading from the speech of Representative STEVENS of Minnesota.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator before he concludes if he thinks Great Britain was actuated by commercial interests and moved by reason of retaliatory legislation, why it was that Great Britain contended at the time she yielded upon this proposition, notwithstanding her contention as to the construction of the treaty was a correct one, that she did not yield her construction of the treaty, but simply abandoned for the time the rebating of the tolls.

Mr. HUGHES. I confess I do not see that the language the Senator quotes from the treaty applies.

Mr. BORAH. It says every obligation of the treaty has been fully and unreservedly met.

Mr. HUGHES. I am speaking of the language of the treaty itself. The Senator goes too far, I think, when he puts it beyond the power of the Members of the Senate to read more than one meaning in the language of the treaty.

I can conceive of one or two other constructions which can be put upon that language. For instance, there is nothing said in that treaty about merchandise.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article from the Washington Post of Monday, May 11, containing a statement made by Hon. Philander C. Knox, formerly Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORMER PREMIER KNOX RIDDLES REPEAL CLAIMS IN A CLEAR ANALYSIS OF TREATY—RIGHT TO PROTECT CANAL IN TIME OF WAR, WHICH GREAT BRITAIN CONCEDES, CARRIES WITH IT PREROGATIVE OF PROTECTING OUR DOMESTIC COMMERCE, HE SAYS—TOO MANY IRRELEVANT MATTERS CLOUD THE ISSUE, SAYS STATESMAN WHO HELD STATE PORTFOLIO UNDER PRESIDENT TAFT.

Philander C. Knox, Secretary of State in President Taft's administration, who rejected Great Britain's protest against the right of the United States to exempt its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for passage through the Panama Canal, when asked to give his views on the question of repealing the free-tolls provision of the present act and to define the exact issue involved in the controversy, said:

"In the discussion of the canal question now, as in the past, too much consideration has been given to treaties, correspondence, documents, opinions, beliefs, and imaginings that are wholly foreign to the simple issue involved. This issue arises out of one tremendous fact and one brief treaty affecting that fact. The fact is our canal at Panama and the treaty is the one negotiated in 1901 by John Hay and Lord Pauncefote. This is the only treaty affecting the issue, as it in explicit terms abrogates the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—the only other one we ever had with Great Britain upon the subject of an isthmian canal. It is true that in the preamble of the later treaty it is recited that one of the things the negotiators intended to do was to include in its terms a provision for the neutrality of the canal, as was contemplated by the earlier treaty, and this they did in its third article.

"The present controversy arises out of Great Britain's challenge of our right to exempt American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. The challenge is predicated upon the claim that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we bargained away that right incident to our ownership.

DEFINITION OF THE ISSUE.

"I am willing to accept the definition of the nature of the issue thus raised given by two eminent gentlemen, one of whom openly favors the repeal of the tolls exemption to American coastwise ships, and the other, it is known, while not asking, would not object to its repeal. Mr. Richard Olney has put in two sentences the nature of Great Britain's claim upon the canal. 'The claim of Great Britain,' said Mr. Olney, 'is, in effect, a territorial claim. The United States possesses no more costly and perhaps no more valuable piece of territory than the Panama Canal, and Great Britain's claim is that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty not only encumbers that territory with equal rights of use by all other nations, but impresses upon it a servitude by which the United States loses the free use of its own canal for its own vessels.'

"Sir Edward Grey's protest states the same proposition in different words, 'the treaty,' says Sir Edward, 'imposes limitations upon the freedom of action of the United States' in respect to the canal. In other words, he claims the treaty imposes limitations upon American sovereignty. From these premises it is easily deduced that the patriotism and good faith of those who maintain as an earnest conviction either side of this disputed legal question should not be challenged. It is just as praiseworthy to defend the American right to deal with our own in accordance with our own convictions of true national interest, if we believe we have not parted with that right, as it is to insist that we should fully comply with our international engagements if we have contracted away our full liberty of action.

"In any discussion of the President's statement that the tolls act violates our treaty, or of Sir Edward Grey's more specific claim that our freedom of action in respect to the canal is limited by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is important to carry in mind that such limitation must either be found in the words of the treaty or arise by necessary and irresistible implication from the facts defining the relation of the parties of the treaty and to its subject.

"The principle of international law governing a claim in derogation of sovereignty being that no treaty can be taken to restrict the exercise or rights of sovereignty unless effected in a clear and distinct manner.

ANALYSIS OF SOVEREIGN RIGHT.

"First, let us look at the facts. The United States paid to Panama $10,000,000 for the zone itself; we have agreed to pay to Panama a yearly annuity of $250,000 forever; we paid to the French Panama Canal Co. $40,000,000 for its rights in the Isthmus; we are building the canal at a total expenditure of about $400,000,000; we alone are to meet the $25,000,000 which it appears to be now proposed to pay Colombia; we alone are expending untold millions necessary to fortify and protect the canal so that some belligerent, eager to secure the resulting advantage, may not destroy it; we alone are bearing the risk of losing all this investment as the result of some natural cataclysm, such as an earthquake, against which no human agency can secure us; we alone have stood for whatever of criticism has come from the manner of acquiring the Canal Zone—a criticism encouraged and fostered by the very class which now seeks to turn over to Europe, as a gratuity, the benefits of our action; we alone have put the lives of the flower of our Army engineers and of thousands of American citizens through all the hazards and dangers of fatal tropic maladies, and finally no other country has shared and does not propose to share one penny of this expenditure or any phase of any risk, connected with our stupendous undertaking. Surely upon these facts there arises no necessary implication that Great Britain is entitled to the benefits of this colossal work on the same and identical terms as we, the owners, the builders, the operators, the protectors, and the insurers of the canal, or that she shall dictate how we shall treat matters of purely local national trade and commerce, or that we shall be denied the very rights in respect to our domestic commerce which she herself claims and exercises and which every other nation in the world possesses.

GRANT OF PRIVILEGE.

"If the limitation which Sir Edward Grey says is imposed upon our freedom of action in respect to the canal does not arise by necessary implication from these facts, let us see if we can find it in the language of the treaty. In short, let us seek the words of limitation.

"They are found, according to the British contention, in article 3. This article is a declaration by the owner of the canal of the terms upon which it is to be used. There are, all told, six rules. The first grants a privilege, the other five specify the conditions upon which that privilege is to be enjoyed. 'The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules' is the language of the grant.

"The conditions to be observed set out in these rules not only all relate to war, but all have reference to imposing the least inconvenience to the owner of the canal arising out of a state of war between the powers using it. * * *

"Of course it must be admitted that by applying a childish logical formula to this text it can be claimed that the United States is included within the words 'all nations,' but a consideration of the relation of the parties to the subject of the treaty shows that the United States, the grantor of conditional privileges in the canal to all nations, parted with no particle of its rights of ownership in the property or subjected its own use of the canal to the conditions it imposed upon the beneficiaries of its generosity.

"Has the United States bound itself not to use the canal if it should exercise a right of war or act of hostility within it; if it should revictual its ships or take stores in the canal; if it should embark or disembark troops within the canal; if its vessels of war should remain within the waters longer than 24 hours; and, if so, who is going to enforce these rules upon the United States, and will our obedience to them be compelled by the guns we are planting there for the protection of the canal? Does not such a view of our rights invite all other nations to war with us, if we, during an actual state of war, use the canal for any military purpose? In short, would we not thus make all nations the allies of our immediate adversary if we have agreed with all nations through Great Britain that the rules we prescribe for the use of the canal apply to ourselves, the grantors of the use?

UNITED STATES AUTOMATICALLY EXEMPT.

"Let us see how Great Britain meets this embarrassment. Sir Edward Grey seeks to avoid the application to the United States of all the rules in article 3 except rule 1 by saying: 'Now that the United States has become practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government does not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.' That is to say, our subsequently acquired sovereignty automatically exempts us from the application of five of the rules to be observed by all nations as a condition for the use of the canal, but our ownership plus our sovereignty does not exempt us from the other one.

"Now, if the right to protect the canal and the right to protect ourselves by exercising privileges in and about the canal denied to other nations by our rules is an incident to our sovereignty, and thus takes the United States out of the meaning of the general words 'all nations,' the right to promote our domestic commerce in a field exclusively its own is an incident of sovereignty and ownership having the same effect. To deny the free use of our own canal for our own vessels is just as much an impairment of our sovereignty as to deny our right to exercise acts of belligerency in and for its protection. And the implication that we have not surrendered one of these sovereign powers by the use of the words 'all nations' is just as strong under the first rule, which is our contention, as it is under the other five, which is Sir Edward Grey's contention.

"'Practical sovereignty,' which, as Great Britain claims, permits us at our own expense and risk to defend the canal, to maintain its neutrality, and to exclusively exercise belligerent rights within its boundaries in time of war imports to its possessor no higher title or privilege than does sovereignty and ownership in time of peace. Our rights in peace bear a just relation to our obligations in war. The benefits of sovereignty go hand in hand with its burdens.

OUR RIGHTS CONCEDED.

"In further illustration of this point it is very interesting to note and consider the admitted effect of another statement in the British protest. It reads, 'At the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the Isthmian Canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States, and consequently there was no need to insert in the draft treaty' articles preserving sovereignty rights. In fine, the fact that we were not sovereign over the canal when the treaty was made excuses us for not reserving sovereign rights. But in the very next sentence the protest states the effect of our subsequently acquired sovereignty was to read into the treaty sovereign powers, and thereby exempted the United States from the conditions prescribed to govern the use of the canal by all nations.

"The perfectly sound principle involved in all this, and so frankly admitted by Sir Edward, is that where sovereignty exists the exercise of its attributes need not be reserved; they are implied; and this is the reason why John Hay, scholar and statesman, familiar with and guided by accepted principles, felt under no compulsion to reserve the rights incident to what he characterized as our complete ownership of the canal.

"It was never contemplated at any period in the history of the Isthmian undertaking that Great Britain should be on terms of equality with the owner of a canal or even with the other users of the canal, except as compensation for her protection of the canal. She never had any treaty with any nation contemplating building a canal until the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, her previous efforts having been confined to declaring the extent of her intentions in respect to some one else's canal to which she proposed to extend her powerful protection.

"How is the United States assured that Great Britain or any other nation will observe the rules we have prescribed for the use of the canal? They have not agreed to do so. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty contains no such an obligation on their part. We refused to accept language proposed by Great Britain that would make the right to use the canal by other nations a contractual right.

IN RIDICULOUS ATTITUDE.

"The failure of other nations to comply with our rules only debars them from the use upon equal terms with such nations as do comply with them, and how are we to know whether they will comply with the rules, which all relate to war, until war exists?

"We find ourselves in rather a ridiculous situation under the British interpretation of the treaty. We are to curtail the rights flowing from sovereignty and absolute ownership of the canal upon the hypothesis that the beneficiaries of our generosity will be so good, even when quarreling with each other, as to comply with the rules we prescribe for its neutrality. The neutrality of the canal will most likely be respected if and only as we, its sovereign, are able to enforce it. * * *

"As Great Britain only claimed that the canal act impaired her treaty rights if it extended the exemption to trade other than legitimate coastwise trade, or if the tolls were computed without taking into account that trade why should we repeal the act when neither of these causes of offense exists?

"What Great Britain really claims is that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty 'imposes limitations upon our freedom of action,' and what she originally asked was, 'in view of the President's memorandum' attached to the canal act, that the question thus raised should be submitted to arbitration.

"Mr. Bryce very truly said in his note of February 27, 1913, submitted after a bill had been introduced to repeal the exemption, 'that a reference to arbitration would be rendered superfluous if steps were taken by the United States to remove the objection entertained by His Majesty's Government to the act.' It certainly would. To repeal the act on the ground that it violates the treaty would be to sanction by act of Congress all that Great Britain could claim before an arbitral tribunal, and so far as the Senate is concerned, confirm the British claim by a majority vote, whereas it would require a two-thirds vote to refer it to arbitration.

"As Great Britain has no interest in the canal itself, but only in the use of the canal, the United States should not admit that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty 'imposes limitations upon the freedom of action of the United States' to legislate upon matters not affecting Great Britain's use or the terms upon which her use is to be enjoyed. And in the absence of allegation or proof that the canal act itself or the President under authority of the act has, as a fact, by exempting coastwise vessels from paying tolls or otherwise, imposed terms upon the British use or charges for such use that otherwise British vessels would not have been compelled to meet or to pay the freedom of action of the United States in legislating respecting its own coastwise trade is not restrained.

"This was the position taken by President Taft, written into our laws by an act of Congress, indorsed by the three great political parties, and supported by all the presidential candidates in the last national campaign.

"It is as sound now as then; indeed, time confirms its wisdom, its patriotism, and its strength."

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if no other Senator wishes to speak on the unfinished business, I renew the request which I previously made that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the Agricultural appropriation bill may now be proceeded with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on page 53, line 22, in the appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act relative to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, to strike out "$50,000," the sum appropriated by the House, and in lieu thereof to insert "$10,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been heretofore ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McLEAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I do not think Senators understand precisely the shape in which the question is now pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 53, reported by the committee, proposing to strike out "$50,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$10,000."

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I am informed by a messenger from his colleague [Mr. OLIVER] that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, if present, would vote "nay." As I intend to vote in the negative, I ask to be recorded. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is sick at home and unable to be in the Senate to-day.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. If the Senator from New Mexico were present I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Were he present, he would vote "nay" and I would vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], but on this particular question I am released from the obligation to my pair, and I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], who is absent. There is no one to whom I can transfer my pair for the present. I shall therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). When I voted I was not aware of the absence from the Chamber of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. As has been stated, he has a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

I also desire to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] who has a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the pair existing between the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON].

Mr. TILLMAN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I find that I can make a transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I will therefore let my vote in the negative stand.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 45, as follows:

So the amendment reported by the committee was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I feel that I ought to say for myself and for several members of the committee that we did not draw in question the policy of the migratory-bird law. For my own part, I favor the conservation of migratory and insectivorous birds. They render a public and private service. They render a service to agriculture. There were many Senators, however, who challenged the constitutionality of the law. It was known of many of them that the employees engaged in the enforcement of this act were to be placed under the civil-service law on April 20. There were many who were unwilling to have an army of civil-service employees attached to the Government in case the constitutionality of the measure should fail. For that reason the committee brought in an amendment for an appropriation of $10,000, in order that the constitutionality of the law might be tested. If the measure shall be held to be constitutional, there will certainly be no disposition on the part of the committee to withhold an ample and adequate appropriation. It was felt, however, that the constitutionality of the law ought to be tried out before creating a horde of officers who would be on our hands in case the measure should miscarry in the courts. I may say that the Secretary of Agriculture stated to the committee that $20,000 would enable him to maintain his organization and to proceed with the enforcement of the law. The committee would have reported $20,000 but for the absence of the Senator from Arkansas, who had taken quite an interest in this appropriation. The measure was not again reverted to after he returned to the committee. It is my judgment that $20,000 would be an ample appropriation in view of the direct statement of the Secretary of Agriculture to the Committee on Agriculture. I therefore move to strike out "$50,000" and to insert "$20,000" as the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not prevail. I am glad to hear from the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] that he approves the purposes of the migratory-bird law, and that he does not think that the Creator made a mistake when he created the insectivorous and useful birds. I am glad the Senator has got so far on the journey, but I think the Senate ought to understand——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. I decline to be interrupted at present, for I want to get this question disposed of this afternoon. I do not care to discuss it at any length, but I do think that the Senate of the United States ought to bear in mind that there is pending to-day, at the request of the Senate of the United States, a treaty which we have every reason to assume takes this existing law into consideration. When that treaty is ratified, as I trust it will be, I can not believe that the Senate of the United States will repudiate its own offspring when it is returned here, and if that proposed treaty meets with the approval of the Senate there will be no question whatever about the right of Congress to enforce the migratory-bird law if the treaty is properly drawn. So it seems to me that if we at this time appropriate a small sum of money, like $20,000, we are giving notice to the British Government that we do not intend to enforce the law. That would be a most unfortunate position for the United States to take at this time.

This money will be wholly in charge of the Secretary of Agriculture, and we all know that he is a man of sufficient ability to use sound discretion in a matter like this. If the treaty is ratified, as it probably will be, before another shooting season opens, every dollar of this money can be expended. I sincerely hope that the Senate will realize that situation and not at this time declare its disinclination to enforce this law. I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma will be defeated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is another exposition of constitutional law. We are now told that Congress is about to approve a treaty, and that when that treaty is approved we will have a new Constitution; that if the migratory-bird law is unconstitutional now, all doubt as to its constitutionality will be removed when we negotiate a treaty with a foreign country. That is a new way to amend the Constitution of the United States. It is another example of the fact that the authors of the migratory-bird law have utterly disregarded every fundamental of the law and every principle of constitutional construction.

Mr. President, it is a singular thing that the Senate of the United States should be swept off its feet by a lot of telegrams inspired from one source, and that about the most irresponsible source it is possible to conceive of. There is a gentleman named Hornaday, or some similar name, who has been the great promoting force back of this legislation. I do not know, sir, whether he is sane or insane; but if he be sane, then he is a common slanderer and a common scoundrel. This man has seen fit to scatter his vituperative abuse broadcast over the land. He came into my office a few weeks ago with a long written statement, in which he denounced as traitors to this country a lot of the very best citizens of the State of Missouri and of the State of Kansas, who belong to a game protective association and who are sportsmen of the highest class, because they had ventured to declare that they proposed to ascertain whether this law was constitutional or unconstitutional; and he broadly asserted in this published statement that any man who dared to refuse to obey an alleged act of Congress upon the ground that it was unconstitutional was a traitor to his country and was guilty of an act which was criminal.

This gentleman made the remarkable request of me that I insist with these citizens of my State that they must acquiesce in the law and that they must under no circumstances test its consitutionality, saying to me that if the law were allowed to stand upon the statute books a few years without being tested people would get used to it, and probably nobody ever would test it. He did not have the temerity to claim that this law was of the slightest validity. I explained to him in the kindliest way I could that these people had legal advice, that they thought they knew their rights, that they were not bad citizens because they raised the question of the constitutionality of a statute, and that I could not advise them that they should abandon their rights; and accordingly I find that the press has been filled up with statements denouncing these gentlemen as "game hogs," and other pleasant terms are used, and my name has been coupled with the rest of the alleged "swine."

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I did not understand the name of the person to whom the Senator referred.

Mr. REED. The man I am talking about is a gentleman named Hornaday. I hope the Senator did not think I was talking about him.

Mr. McLEAN. No; and I hope the Senator will not hold the migratory-bird law responsible for his controversy with a private citizen.

Mr. REED. I undertake to say that that private citizen had more to do with the passage of the migratory-bird law than had the Senator. I undertake to say that that gentleman is the man who put forth the propaganda, who has flooded the Senate with letters. I undertake to say that he is responsible for the denunciation that has been leveled at every man who has had the temerity to say that the Government of the United States has no right to interfere with the internal affairs of States; and every man who has been abused and mistreated and libeled and slandered in connection with this matter can count it up to the inspiration of the gentleman I am talking about.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WEST. Where parties have been found guilty of violation of the migratory-bird law, have there not been merely nominal fines imposed in order to keep from testing its constitutionality?

Mr. REED. My understanding is that that is the case. Now, Mr. President, I claim to be as thoroughly in favor of the protection of the game of this country as is the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. Right there I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that this is a proper subject for international negotiation; that it can be covered effectively by treaty; and that if the pending treaty takes into consideration the terms of the existing law, the constitutional infirmities of that law will not be healed, if there are any?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; you can no more amend the Constitution of the United States by a treaty with a foreign power than you can remove the sun from its orbit——

Mr. McLEAN. That is not the point.

Mr. REED. Or the world from its course. When did it happen——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Let me put it to the Senator in this way: When did it happen that we proposed to permit a foreign country help us change the Constitution of the United States? The Senator from Connecticut can not mean that.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, we are not changing the Constitution of the United States; we are simply following the course which has been laid down by our Supreme Court in its interpretation of that Constitution, which is that where a matter is a proper subject for international negotiation and a treaty follows, the provisions of that treaty may be enforced, notwithstanding the fact that prior to the existence of the treaty the States would have jurisdiction over the matter.

Mr. REED. Oh, the Senator can not mean to tell the Senate that any court has decided that a fundamental right reserved to the people of any State, or, rather, never yielded by them, can in any way be taken away by a treaty between this country and a foreign country.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. REED. I am trying to do so, if I can understand the question.

Mr. McLEAN. I will put it so that the Senator can answer it categorically, by stating the existence of our treaties with Great Britain regarding the protection of the swimming fishes, which to-day are entirely within waters within State jurisdiction and to-morrow are in waters under foreign jurisdiction. When they are protected by treaty, I will ask him if he thinks that those treaties violate the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. The Senator from Oklahoma has asked me that he be allowed to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question, and I yield to him.

Mr. GORE. The treaty-making power of the Government of the United States is vested in the President and the Senate. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks that the President and the Senate could enter into a treaty with Great Britain to abolish the House of Representatives, and if such a treaty would be binding on anybody, anywhere?

Mr. McLEAN. That, Mr. President, would not be a proper matter for international negotiation. The Senators upon the other side of the Chamber decline to answer my question. I ask them whether they think that negotiations between this Government and Great Britain for the protection of the migratory feræ naturæ, which to-day are in Central America, to-morrow in this country, and the next day in Canada, is a proper subject for an international agreement? That is the question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course the Government of the United States can enter into treaties with other countries with relation to the waters of the high seas and the fishes and birds therein, while they remain thereon or therein, but the Government of the United States can not go into a sovereign State and itself exercise any power unless that power has been granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution of the United States; and as the Government of the United States can not itself exercise a power within a State that has not been granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government, of course it can not in concert with England or all the other nations of the world do that which it can not do itself.

Mr. McLEAN. But the Senator has not answered my question. I ask him whether he thinks that this particular question which involves the protection of migratory birds is a proper one for international negotiation?

Mr. REED. It is a proper thing for international negotiation so long as it is limited to those waters over which the United States holds exclusive jurisdiction, or a jurisdiction which is joint with the other nations of the earth.

Mr. McLEAN. But take the birds that do not touch the water, that fly through the atmosphere that covers the Western Hemisphere?

Mr. REED. Under the law, when such birds cross over a State the laws of that State govern, and not the laws of England, where they started from, or of Australia, where they may be going.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator has not yet answered my question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am trying awfully hard to do so.

Mr. McLEAN. That question is susceptible of a categorical answer. I should like to know whether the Senator thinks the protection of the migratory bird, which to-day may be in Central America, to-morrow in this country, and the next day in Canada, is a proper subject for international negotiation and treaty?

Mr. REED. It is a proper subject for international negotiation if we limit what we attempt to do to that which our Federal Government has the right to control; but it is not a proper subject of negotiation if you undertake to extend it to a point where you invade the rights of the several States under the Constitution.

Mr. McLEAN. I will put the question in another way, because I think we can save time by it. I simply want the Senate to understand my position. The Senator says that no respectable lawyer would take the views that I take with regard to this matter.

Mr. REED. I do not understand the Senator to say that the law is constitutional.

Mr. McLEAN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that a great many lawyers, possibly as respectable as the Senator from Missouri, have in times past been as positive as he is that certain acts of Congress have clearly violated the Constitution, but the Supreme Court has disagreed with them. I think discretion is the better part of valor in these matters. Now I come to another question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Does he assert that this law is constitutional?

Mr. McLEAN. I will answer that question. I am not certain. No man is certain of the constitutionality of a law until the Supreme Court has passed upon it.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator believe it is constitutional?

Mr. McLEAN. I think there is plenty of room in the Constitution for this law if there is room for 50 per cent of the laws that we are enforcing by appropriations in the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, that is not an answer. The Senator certainly can tell us whether he is willing to say to the Senate now that he believes this law is a constitutional law. He ought to be willing to state his opinion.

Mr. McLEAN. I certainly think, from my study of the question, that the Supreme Court ought to hold this law constitutional. If I were a judge upon the bench, I would so hold.

Mr. REED. But the Senator has not been willing to hazard the opinion that it is a constitutional law.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, I certainly think so, if that is what the Senator wants to know.

Mr. REED. Upon what clause or power of the Constitution does the Senator base the exercise of this right?

Mr. McLEAN. I have at my desk a brief that I have prepared upon the subject. I will send the Senator a copy of it. The conclusion is that I believe this law is constitutional.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator would tell us upon what clause he bases that opinion. There must be a clause.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, in a word, I think that where the necessity to protection exists, where the right to protection is clear, and the State, as in this case, is absolutely incompetent to protect itself in the enjoyment of the natural right to be saved from irreparable loss by noxious insects.

Mr. REED. The Senator assumes the whole question. He says "where the right exists," by which he means that where the right exists in the Federal Government to do a thing, it may do it. Does the Senator claim that these birds are engaged in interstate commerce, for instance?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I do not.

Mr. REED. Very well. The Senator, then, does not rest it upon the interstate-commerce clause. The Senator does not claim that it comes under the clause which gives the Federal Government authority to establish courts, does he?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not.

Mr. REED. Or under the clause which gives the Federal Government authority to establish an Army and a Navy or post offices and post roads?

Mr. McLEAN. I will save the Senator the trouble of continuing the list. I think it is one of those implied attributes of sovereignty in which the Federal Government has concurrent jurisdiction with the States. It is a dormant right in the Federal Government, and where the State is thoroughly and clearly incompetent to save itself there is no help except from the Federal Government.

Mr. REED. There may be no help for many things in this world, either by State law or by national law.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, yes; there is authority somewhere.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks of implied powers.

Mr. McLEAN. No; an implied attribute of sovereignty.

Mr. REED. An implied attribute of sovereignty, then. What does the Senator do with the clause of the Constitution which states in express terms that all powers are reserved to the States except those expressly therein granted?

Mr. McLEAN. I do precisely what the Supreme Court did with it in the greenback cases.

Mr. REED. Wipe it out?

Mr. McLEAN. It wiped out the objection and the claim that there was not an implied attribute of sovereignty.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator wants to put the constitutional right to protect his ducks upon the same ground that the Supreme Court put its decision in the greenback case. Is that because both of them have green backs? Is that the analogy? [Laughter.]

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, I know, Mr. President, that in the opinion of the Senator from Missouri the only good bird is a dead bird.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. McLEAN. I can not understand the Senator's antipathy toward anything that wears wings.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Connecticut is a most lovable and intelligent gentleman, and I have for him the kindest personal feeling, as he knows; but the trouble with the Senator is that he concludes that all who do not accept his remedy are enemies of the cause; that he has the only possible remedy; that if the patient does not take his physic, the patient must die——

Mr. McLEAN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. And that all who protest that his particular kind of nostrum should not be taken want to murder the patient.

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no; I take no such ground.

Mr. REED. I want the Senator to disabuse his mind of the idea that I think the only good bird is a dead bird. The Senator had no right to say that. I claim to be as good a friend of bird life as the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. We will admit that.

Mr. REED. I claim to be a better friend of bird life than the Senator, because while he is fooling away—if he will pardon the expression, and I do not mean it unpleasantly—the time of the country in endeavoring to have enacted a law which ultimately must be stricken down, and which in the end will result in total failure, I would take up the plain half of the law, where you can accomplish something, where you can get a result, and I would save the years that will be wasted by attempting to do that which is unconstitutional.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon another interruption?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. I should like to get the Senator's views upon the real question at issue, because it seems to me his personal views or mine as to the utility and beauty of the birds are not so important at this time. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks the sovereignty of the United States with regard to its power to make treaties is not coextensive with that of other nations?

Mr. REED. Why, not at all.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator does not think so?

Mr. REED. Not in all respects.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator think it would be in this respect?

Mr. REED. No. I do not think the United States is Russia. I apprehend that the Czar of Russia, because he is an autocrat and has unlimited power, could make almost any kind of treaty he wanted to make. He could make almost any kind of treaty with another government because over his own people, who are mere subjects, he exercises almost unlimited power.

Mr. McLEAN. We will take Great Britain. We will assume that Great Britain invites us to negotiate a treaty covering this subject. We have, then, in this country 48 States and a Nation. We have 49 sovereignties in all, but we have no real sovereign if we can not deal with this question, because 14 of the nations of Europe have already entered into treaty negotiations for the protection of the migratory birds.

Mr. REED. The Senator is—oh, well, how shall I discuss this question? The Senator certainly knows that our National Government is a Government of certain restricted powers; that it has no powers except those which were granted to it by the voluntary act of the States and those powers which are necessarily involved in and a part of the powers expressly granted. The Senator certainly knows that the United States is a Government of limited powers. He certainly knows that the States of this Union are complete and absolute sovereigns except in so far as they have granted to the Federal Government certain of their sovereign attributes.

Mr. McLEAN. States can not make treaties.

Mr. REED. States can not make treaties, but the Government of the United States can not make a treaty which violates the Constitution of the United States. If it did, then the President and the Senate alone could wipe out the Constitution of the United States at any time they saw fit.

Mr. McLEAN. That is perfectly true.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator believe that?

Mr. McLEAN. What the Senator has said?

Mr. REED. Does the Senator believe that?

Mr. McLEAN. I certainly do.

Mr. REED. The Senator does? Then, if the Senate please, I submit that as the final word on the authority of the Senator as a constitutional lawyer, and I proceed to discuss the question.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, we can not wipe out the Constitution. The Constitution gives us the power to regulate this subject by treaty, in my opinion. The Senator has said that he thinks this is not a proper subject for international negotiation.

Mr. REED. Oh, I did not say that. I said it was a proper subject for international negotiation so long as the Government of the United States limited the effect of its treaty to those waters over which it exercised complete sovereignty or over which it exercised joint sovereignty with other nations.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

We passed the law upon which this appropriation is based. So far as we are concerned, it is now the law of the land. The question of its constitutionality is not and can not be determined in this body. There is but one place in which it can be determined.

The law may or may not be constitutional. It is, however, at present the law of the land. It has been in process of administration. As I understand, an organization has been perfected by the Secretary of Agriculture under the law, and it is now at work. Whether it is working well or ill, I do not know. The Secretary of Agriculture has asked $100,000 to go on with this work. The House granted half that sum.

It has occurred to me that I would be hardly justified, even if my private and personal opinion were that the law was unconstitutional and might finally be determined to be unconstitutional, in handicapping the operating of the Government under this law while the law is upon the statute books and still in force. Even if I held the view which the Senator from Missouri holds, that as an absolute dead certainty a law passed by two bodies of Congress and signed by the President is unconstitutional, I should hesitate to withhold my approval of an appropriation upon my own individual opinion as to the constitutionality of the law. That is a consideration for my own government, of course.

Mr. REED. There are many questions upon which lawyers differ. There is always a shadow land between that which is constitutional and that which may be unconstitutional. When a question is in that shadow land, all of us would naturally say that the law having been enacted we certainly would give it the benefit of the doubt.

Even then, however, as long as a reasonable doubt exists, I put it to the Senator who asked me the question, if we ought to set up a machinery costing thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars until the constitutionality of the statute has been determined, when that constitutionality could be determined within 30 days of time without the slightest difficulty, at least so far as the decision of one of the United States courts is concerned?

We can get to a point where there can be but little, if any, doubt; and we are at that point, in my opinion, in regard to this bill. I have just stated to the Senate that the man who has preached this propaganda himself came to me begging that the law should not be tested. The Senator from Connecticut, when he advocated this bill in the first instance, did not profess to declare it constitutional, for I remember interrogating him on the floor, and his reply was that he was not a constitutional lawyer; that some lawyers had said they thought it might stand, or words to that effect. You have just heard the reasons he gives here, which amount to this, that "the law is not constitutional now, but we are going to make it constitutional by negotiating a treaty with some foreign country." Under those circumstances, should we proceed to set up an expensive and permanent machinery, or should we say to the Attorney General, "You have a general appropriation; you have your courts; you have your prosecuting attorneys. It does not require any large sum of money to try one of these cases; in fact, it does not require a 5-cent nickel to test one of them, unless a brief is written on appeal. You proceed now, and if this law is sustained, we will set up this costly and expensive machinery for you. We will get a man to go into every county of every State to interfere with the rights of the local people. We will proceed to let down the bars, and we will create this great board of national game wardens"? But until and as long as this not doubt, but certainty, in my opinion, exists that the law is unconstitutional, why proceed to create this machinery?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. The proposition before the Senate is to appropriate $50,000 for this purpose. You could not obtain a decent man for the service for less than $1,500 a year. It might take a thousand dollars a year to pay his traveling expenses. If we appropriated $50,000, and it were all expended for service, that would employ 20 men. Now, what does the Senator from Missouri mean by "creating a horde of Government employees" to carry out the purposes of this act?

Mr. REED. I mean to say that when you enacted this law you only asked for $10,000 to enforce it.

Mr. WEEKS. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. At the next session of Congress we are confronted with a request for $100,000, but with the statement made to the committee that $20,000 will enable them to test the law. Now, what is the use of employing 20 men, as the Senator suggests, and sending them out to enforce the law? Those 20 men, if they were all we were to have, could no more enforce this law than one township constable could preserve the peace of the United States.

The only end that can be served by this appropriation is merely to test the law. Fifty thousand dollars will not enforce it. The crack of the shotgun will go on just as in the past. The only effect will be to put some gentlemen in the civil service and to set up a permanent machinery now, and the next time they will again multiply the amount by 10, and only the Infinite One knows where their demands will cease.

I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that this law can be tested without the expenditure of a penny; and I want solemnly to assert that the Federal authorities have been running away from a test of this law. I am about to submit some evidence on that point.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, every pothunter in the United States has been crying out against the constitutionality of this law for the past two years. If it were unconstitutional, why did he not bring a test case and take it before the courts?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will tell you why he did not bring a test case. This is a criminal statute. The only way you can test it to save your life is to get arrested. They have practically made no arrests except where the individual would agree to plead guilty and pay a merely nominal fine. They have refused to arrest men who proposed to test the law and who had the ability to test it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say that there have not been arrests under this act and in every case the person arrested has plead guilty?

Mr. REED. I mean to say that every one of those arrests has been of a man who either did not want to test the law or was too poor to test the law, or, to use a somewhat slangy expression, they were "fake" arrests. I am about to show the Senate that up to this hour they have declined to make an arrest where the people were able to test the law.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator makes a somewhat startling criticism of the administration of the law within the past 12 months; but that is not what I had in mind. The committee recommends the appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. WEST. Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand this to be a committee amendment that is now offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, recommending the appropriation of $20,000. The House recommended the appropriation of $50,000. I wish to ask whether the Senator believes that $20,000 for this service would be constitutional and $50,000 for this service would be unconstitutional?

Mr. REED. Oh, the Senator's wit is so refined that it is absolutely unanswerable. To undertake to reply to that would be to play with a razor that not only has two edges but is nothing but edges. I would not dare touch it, lest I should commit felo de se.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We are all familiar with the manner in which the Senator answers questions.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not ask that question in good faith, did he?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My question was directed to the chairman of the committee, not to the Senator from Missouri. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri, however, that there is a way to test this law, and that is to have the law itself administered by the officers of the law. I am loath to believe that under this administration or any other the officers of the law have not honestly endeavored to prosecute offenders under the law. It seems to me somewhat remarkable that the officers charged upon their oath with the administration of the criminal statutes should flee the responsibility which is placed upon them.

The Senator's startling statement is what challenged my attention. I am sorry to hear it.

Mr. REED. I am about to sustain it. The Senator is correct. He agrees with me exactly when I say that the way to test this law is for the authorities to cause somebody's arrest, and to try him, and convict him, and punish him if he does not appeal.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Has the Senator, in the papers which he has there, evidence or statements to the effect that the Department of Justice, or whoever is charged with the administration of this law, will not make an arrest and will not attempt to execute the law where they think its constitutionality is likely to be challenged? If so, I am in favor of wiping out all administrative appropriations of any nature for that department.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I have not been so unfortunate as to leave at my office part of this correspondence, I am about to submit it; and if I have done so, I shall ask permission to submit it to-morrow morning.

The very earliest letter or two that I wrote with regard to this law I have not with me at the present moment. The letter that I now intend to read, in my opinion, sufficiently covers the subject matter. It is as follows:

MARCH 9, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I am inclosing you a copy of my letter written you on February 11, 1914; also your reply of the 17th instant.

My letter requests an opinion as to the validity of the national game law. Your reply is to the effect that it will be your duty to enforce the law, and for that and other reasons you can not give an opinion as to its validity.

I agree with you fully that it is your duty to attempt to enforce the law if you believe it to be constitutional. Now, I have to request that you do enforce the law. I am inclosing herewith a telegram from Dr. S. H. Ragan, president of the Interstate Sportsmen's Protective Association, which embraces a membership of 800 citizens of Missouri and Kansas, stating that they have made application to the United States commissioner and Federal judge—

I wish the Senator would listen to this.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am listening.

Mr. REED (reading):

stating that they have made application to the United States commissioner and Federal judge for a warrant charging them, or one of the members of the club, with shooting ducks in violation of the law. The committee have offered affidavits of eyewitnesses to the offense, but a warrant has been refused.

I think these gentlemen are entitled to the privilege of being arrested. The victim they produced, who is willing to offer himself upon the altar of the Constitution, is no less than my personal friend, Ed. F. Swinney, president of the First National Bank of Kansas City. The men belonging to this organization are not lawbreakers, but they believe the Federal game law is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

It seems to me that the people are entitled to know whether this law is or is not valid, and the only way that question can be determined, in the absence of an opinion from yourself, as the chief law officer of the Government, is to have a case tried in the courts.

The fact of the matter is that the law is being violated habitually by practically everybody who wants to shoot ducks or other game—at least, such is my information. Now, it seems to me that the Government should advise all citizens that the law is invalid or else the Government should treat the law as valid and proceed against one or more of the violators, to the end that the law may be settled.

Will you not kindly instruct the district attorney at Kansas City to cause the arrest of one of these men at Kansas City against whom conclusive evidence of shooting birds can be produced?

Liberty has, indeed, sunk to a low ebb—

He was semijocular or so intended to be—

Liberty has indeed sunk to a low ebb when a citizen of the Republic can not get himself arrested on request.

Thanking you for a reply at your earliest convenience, I am,

Yours, with great respect,

_____ _____.

That was dated March 9. I have the following reply from the Department of Justice addressed to myself:

MARCH 17, 1914.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the 9th instant to the Attorney General in reference to the Federal migratory-bird law, in which you state that certain members of the Interstate Sportsmen's Protective Association have made application to the United States commissioner and the Federal judge for a warrant charging them, or one of the members of the club, with shooting ducks in violation of the law, and you desire this department to instruct the United States attorney to cause the arrest of one of them so that the constitutionality of the law may be tested.

The administration of the law is in charge of the Department of Agriculture, and this department would prefer not to act in the matter until a case has been reported to it by that department with clear evidence proving a violation of the law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. On Saturday when this subject was under discussion I read a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture. That letter was in reply to one written by me asking him as to what action had been taken concerning the enforcement of this law. He said that some prosecutions had occurred—four cases in California in which pleas of guilty were entered, one case in Oregon in which a plea of guilty was entered, and another in Arkansas in which the same thing occurred—and that a newspaper article had been called to his attention showing that in one of the Western States some one had demurred to the indictment on the ground that the act was unconstitutional and the demurrer being overruled he had pleaded guilty. But in that letter, which is in the RECORD, on page 8350, the Secretary of Agriculture stated that no case had been found which the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture thought it advisable to present to the Department of Justice, and I make the statement that it is the policy of that department not to permit this act to be tested; that its whole course since the law was passed has been to prevent a determination of the question as to the constitutionality of the act, and that that conclusion is plainly inferable and clearly implied from the letter which I read on last Saturday and which is found on page 8350. In that letter the Secretary of Agriculture said:

The prosecution of cases arising under the law is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. So far no case has been presented to this department which our solicitor has deemed it advisable to present to the Department of Justice. I can not say when such a case will be found. A number of violations of the act have been prosecuted, however, in various States in which the defendants have pleaded guilty, but these cases have not come to this department or afforded an opportunity for a test of the law.

Omitting a part of the letter, of which I have stated the substance already, it proceeds:

The department itself, so far, has not reported a case to the Attorney General, but has investigated numerous alleged violations, and in every case has found that the facts did not warrant indictments.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the Senator read in this connection a part of the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture on page 8355 of the RECORD?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; that letter was inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. BRYAN. I will read it.

As to the matter of testing the law, I personally have no desire to press the matter. The only question is whether it can be kept out of the courts. There is pressure on the Department of Justice to have the law tested.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that confirms the statement I made, that it is the policy of the Department of Agriculture to avoid any determination of the constitutionality of this act.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to a statement also in the letter on page 8350, that another prosecution is now pending in the State of Arkansas where this question will come up.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the Senator speak louder?

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand the case will be dismissed.

Mr. WARREN. We can not hear the conversation, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the significant thing is that the Secretary of Agriculture makes this statement:

As to the matter of testing the law, I personally have no desire to press the matter. The only question is whether it can be kept out of the courts.

Then the Attorney General writes me the administration of this law is in the charge of the Department of Agriculture, and the department would prefer not to act in the matter until a case has been reported to it by that department with clear evidence proving a violation of the law. The gentleman who is charged with the duty of enforcing the law says he has not any interest in enforcing it, and that the only thing he wants to do—for that is what the language means—is to keep out of the courts, if he can keep out of the courts. Then you want to give him $50,000 to do what? To spend in a case where he says he does not want to get into the court.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator will permit me, I will tell him one respect in which the money would be expended. It is proposed to send men into the southern fields where these birds migrate, and as far as possible make inventories of the birds, to see the effect of the law from last year to this year, and determine whether the act is going to be beneficial or not.

Mr. REED. In other words, we are going to have a man down there counting wild ducks, to find out how many of them have been kept from being killed by a law that they are afraid to enforce.

Mr. WEEKS. We are going to try to prevent the birds of this country from getting into the condition wild animals are in, where we have to go over to the zoological garden to find them.

Mr. REED. Oh, your intentions are all right. I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senator from Connecticut, and to every Senator upon this floor, that every moment you waste keeping upon the statute books a law that its author doubts, and that the executive branch of the Government dare not enforce, you have lost that much time in having passed laws in the various States that can be enforced, and which will protect the game. Every moment you spend traveling a wrong road you waste that much time which ought to be spent traveling the right road. Every moment you concentrate the efforts of the people of this country who love game and want to protect it along a false line, just that long you postpone the day when game can be and will be protected.

Now, I want to say to both the Senators who have spoken here that I expect that I am a better gamester than either one of them, and I expect I have spent more time in hunting game and as much effort in protecting game as either of them, if we except the misdirected but very humane efforts that have been put forward by the Senator in passing this unconstitutional law.

But I proceed with this letter. Mark now, this is a game of battledore and shuttlecock. My friend from Arkansas went to the Department of Agriculture to get the enforcement, and they told him they did not care to get into the courts, and that what generally the violator of the law wants to do is to keep out of the courts. I go to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General pushes me up to the Department of Agriculture. I presume that my friend ROBINSON and I passed each other as we were being kicked from one department over to the other. We were birds of passage, and there was no game law to protect us, not even the subject of a treaty. I read on:

The administration of the law is in charge of the Department of Agriculture, and this department would prefer not to act in the matter until a case has been reported to it by that department with clear evidence proving a violation of the law. The evidence must be very clear.

Mr. President, a few weeks ago, all over the West and South, you could hear the crack of the shotgun from morning until night. The pothunter was abroad in the land and laughing at this foolish law. There was no more difficulty in finding a man who was guilty of shooting game within that sacred limit, that had been fixed not by Congress but by the Secretary of Agriculture, than there would have been to have gone on the streets of the city and find a white man. Yet they could not get a case with evidence. It had to be very clear evidence. When men were going upon the trains every day with their guns in their cases and their hunting clothes; when they were camping out along rivers and lakes; when they were boldly carrying their game over their backs through the streets of the city, the Government could not get a case strong enough to prosecute. The reason is, as stated by the Secretary of Agriculture, in effect, that they wanted to keep out of court. I will read on:

Inquiry at the Department of Agriculture has developed the fact that that department intends within a few days to report to this department several cases for prosecution, in which the constitutionality of the law can be properly raised.

Of course, you go out here and arrest some hunter who has $5 or $2 in his pocket and has an old muzzle-loading shotgun, the kind of men they pick out. Such a man would plead guilty; he could not test the constitutionality of the act; but you could not go down and arrest men who were able to defend themselves.

You will easily see—

And I call attention to this—

the impropriety of this department's attempting to prosecute cases which are in reality collusive, and to issue warrants of arrest for persons who themselves come forward and claim to have been guilty of violating a Federal statute.

They were hunting with a vengeance for somebody to prosecute; they were keen upon the scent, indeed, when they would not file a charge against the man who came in and said, "Here I am; I shot a duck. Here it is. Arrest me and I will see whether you have got a good law or a bad law."

Mr. President, I wrote in reply to that on March 23. It is addressed to Mr. Underwood:

I am replying to your March 17 letter, written in reply to mine of the 9th, in which I stated to you that the Interstate Sportsmen's Protective Association had made application to the United States commissioner and Federal judge for a warrant charging one of their members with shooting ducks in violation of the law, and in which I suggested that a case of that character ought to be brought in order to test the constitutionality of the law.

I further stated that the committee stood ready to furnish affidavits of eyewitnesses to the violation, and that these affidavits were against E. F. Swinney, president of the First National Bank of Kansas City. In a word, I stated in my letter that there was abundant evidence of an actual violation of the law.

You inform me that the administration of the law is in charge of the Department of Agriculture. It is true that the Department of Justice has not been deprived of its right to enforce the criminal features of the law against all violators.

You say: "You will easily see the impropriety of this department's attempting to prosecute cases which are in reality collusive and to issue warrants for arrest of persons who themselves come forward and claim to have been guilty of violating a Federal statute."

With all due respect to you, I see no such impropriety. It may be that your experience in the Department of Justice has given you a more exalted conception of legal ethics than is possessed by the ordinary lawyers and judges with whom I have associated, but in my humble career as a lawyer and sometime prosecutor I have always found when the constitutionality of a law was seriously questioned that it was thought highly proper to cause an arrest of some person who desired to test the law and, upon undisputed and admitted facts, bring the case to a speedy termination.

One reason I want the law tested is that now there is an item in the Agricultural appropriation bill of $50,000 to be expended in the enforcement of this law, and I am unwilling that this appropriation shall be made and a large sum of money expended thereunder if we are to find after the money has been expended that the law is not worth the paper it is written on. I do not think we are warranted in going on and making the appropriation and wasting a large part of the money therein set aside because of the supersensitive nature of the Department of Justice.

It seems to me this very practical problem ought not to fail of speedy solution because of the overscrupulosity of the department regarding the ethical proprieties.

I may add that I addressed my letter to the Attorney General, and I should like to have it laid before him.

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

Mr. President, from that day to this there has not been any prosecution. I did get a letter saying that if I would file the affidavit they might proceed.

It seems to me that this matter ought to be met in a perfectly sane and practical way. If those who are interested in the law think they have even a remote chance to obtain a decision sustaining it as constitutional, then they ought to proceed with all vigor, because to-day, as they know and will not deny, this law is ignored substantially by everyone from the Atlantic to the Pacific, except a few men who prefer to forego their shooting to the naked possibility of the annoyance of an arrest.

They ought, therefore, to welcome the opportunity to test it. If it be a valid law and binding, then its enforcement will follow as a matter of course, and obedience to it will become well-nigh universal, without a single additional arrest being made. The only violations thereafter will be by those men who are willing to take the chances of violating a law, hoping to escape. Those men constitute a small per cent of the real hunters of the country. That method, if the law be constitutional, will preserve the game; it will put a stop almost at once to 95 per cent of the killing at least; but so long as the authors of the law and the authorities of the Government refuse to accept the challenge that is issued by these sportsmen's associations, and the law goes unenforced and untested, the result will be in the future just what it has been in the past, that the slaughter of game will go on uninterrupted and unchecked. Every day you delay the testing of this law you increase the slaughter of the game in this country.

Mr. McLEAN rose.

Mr. REED. The Senator will ask me if the law is declared unconstitutional whether we really lose anything, for, if it is declared unconstitutional, we have all the law left after it is declared unconstitutional that we had before, and I grant that proposition.

Mr. McLEAN. No. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to say that I should agree with him in his position but for the fact that the enforcement of the law will not be required now until the opening of another shooting season, as the shooting seasons now are closed throughout the United States under State laws.

Mr. REED. Yes. Then—if the Senator will pardon me for making this merely a personal colloquy—why not test this law now?

Mr. McLEAN. I was about to reply to the Senator. I should agree with him that the only thing to do is to test this law, and to test it at once, but for the fact which I have tried to make plain to the Senator, that not only in my opinion, but in the opinion of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who first introduced the resolution requesting the President to negotiate treaties with foreign nations; in the opinion of the late Senator from Georgia, Mr. Bacon, with whom I discussed this subject at length; in the opinion of the late Senator from Idaho, Mr. Heyburn, and of others who were interested in the matter when it was under discussion and they were in the Senate—but especially Senator Bacon insisted upon it—the treaty with Great Britain and the treaties with other countries were the only means that would effectively protect the migratory birds; that even a constitutional amendment would only in a measure cover the subject; that it was not merely a State question; that it was not merely a Federal question, but that it was a question which interested the entire Western Hemisphere.

It was my belief then, and it is my belief now—though I do not undertake to prophesy—that the nations of the Western Hemisphere sooner or later—and the sooner the better—if they wish to preserve the good opinion of posterity, will follow the example of the nations of Europe and will protect the migratory birds of this hemisphere by international agreement, for that is the only way in which it can be done.

Mr. REED. Well, if that be so——

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator will pardon me until I have finished——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. That treaty is pending; it has been submitted by the British ambassador to his Government; and we have every reason to believe that it will be returned to the Senate for a decision. If that treaty is ratified by the Senate and takes into consideration the terms of the existing law——

Mr. REED. Which is unconstitutional.

Mr. McLEAN. No; there is where the Senator and I differ. Suppose we assume that it is unconstitutional without the international agreement; we will assume that——

Mr. REED. You will assume that?

Mr. McLEAN. There are plenty of instances where jurisdiction remains with the State until by treaty it is assumed by the Federal Government. The Senator from Missouri will not dispute that.

Mr. REED. I think I should have to do so.

Mr. McLEAN. I can refer to five or six cases, from Ware against Hylton down to Griggs against Geofrys, where the Supreme Court has clearly announced the principle which I maintain.

Now, when we come to discuss the treaty, if the Senator from Missouri is right, we must look for some other way; there is no question about that; but in my opinion, if the Senator will give the subject his careful study, he will by the time that treaty is presented to the Senate entirely agree, I will not say with me, but with the constitutional lawyers of the Senate, who agree with me.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator from Connecticut would file an opinion of a constitutional lawyer of the Senate which will state that if the United States makes a treaty with England in regard to migratory birds, thereupon its constitutional powers will be extended over the various States, and that that subject matter will be taken away from the purview of their legislative authority. I should like to see that kind of an opinion of a constitutional lawyer of the Senate or of any other body.

Mr. McLEAN. I can show the Senator the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which would be better than my opinion.

Mr. REED. Well, really, I suppose the Senator and I will disagree when we come to reading such an opinion.

Mr. President, if what the Senator from Connecticut says is true—and what he said was not apropos to anything I was arguing when he rose to his feet; but that was entirely satisfactory to me—then, the first thing to do would be to repeal this law and get it out of the way, because if there was such a thing as a right to regulate by treaty, we would have to depend upon the treaty and subsequent legislation, and not upon a law which had been already passed, which was dead when it was born, and into which you would undertake the hopeless task of breathing life by virtue of a subsequent act.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, not at all, because the treaty should take into consideration the existence of this very law. That is the reason I want this appropriation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the line of difference between the Senator from Connecticut and myself is so wide that we hardly need to pursue the subject. If it be true that the Federal Government can take over to itself powers to control the internal affairs of the States, or, to state it differently—for it can not take them over, and if it attempts to do so its law is invalid—if that law can be made valid by negotiating a treaty with England or with some other country, then there is no use in my discussing the question of the Constitution at all. I suppose the Senator now would have the Department of Agriculture wait to institute prosecutions until the treaty to which he has referred has been negotiated.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say frankly to the Senator that if the treaty fails the next thing is to test the constitutionality of the law.

Mr. REED. First, however, we must spend $50,000, and then we must try to negotiate a treaty with England, and after all that has been done, we are going finally to submit to arresting somebody who will test the law, and that is what you want $50,000 of the taxpayers' money for.

Mr. McLEAN. There will be no occasion to spend a dollar of the money until after we have had an opportunity to ratify the treaty.

Mr. REED. I understood some Senator to say a little while ago that you were going to use this money, not to enforce the law but to count the ducks in the swamps down South.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Missouri understands that every dollar which may be appropriated for the Department of Justice is subject to the command of that department to enforce this law.

Mr. REED. Then why make this appropriation? Why not let the Department of Justice make use of such money as it has available, and go ahead and enforce the law? Here as a proposition——

Mr. McLEAN. I mean to test it in the courts.

Mr. REED. Let us put it in plain, simple language. You have a law that the Department of Agriculture is afraid to try to enforce, that the Department of Justice is afraid to try to enforce, and the Senator, as the author of that law, asks that we shall appropriate $50,000, but that $50,000 is not to be expended until we have negotiated a treaty with England; and if that treaty with England is finally accepted, then, and in that event, and only in that event, we will expend some money trying to enforce the statute, hoping that the treaty may have injected constitutionality into that which was unconstitutional. As suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], it is a sort of legal naturalization.

In the meantime, however, we will have this $50,000, which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] says will be used to inventory birds to ascertain what effect the enactment of a law which is not enforced will have upon migratory birds. I submit that that is not a question of law at all; that is a sort of psychological proposition—what effect an unenforced law will have upon the number of birds. I do not know to what department of the Government such a matter ought to go—possibly to the astronomical observatory. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I wish Senators would confine this debate to questions at issue. I would like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that my reason for desiring an appropriation is that if we do ratify the treaty and do not appropriate any money, then next fall, when we need the money and Congress is not in session, we will not be able to get it.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, we are not going to ratify any such treaty at this session of Congress; the treaty is not made. I do not know whether it will ever be made; but if it is ever made it certainly can not be submitted until the next session of Congress, and when it is submitted and approved Congress will be in session. If it is then discovered that by making a treaty you have made that constitutional which was previously unconstitutional, or have extended the Constitution and amended it by virtue of a treaty—if you have done that, then two things follow: First, you do not need any treaty if you have made the law constitutional; and, second, even if you did need an appropriation, all you would have to do would be to make the appropriation at that session of Congress, the same session of Congress at which you adopt the treaty that is going to amend the Constitution of the United States.

The truth is that there is not the slightest excuse in the world for appropriating one penny for this purpose at this time. Why? Because we have all the machinery of justice; we have our United States marshals; we have our United States district attorneys; we have our United States courts; we have our juries; and all of them are in good working order. Furthermore, the Department of Justice has a general appropriation, and all that is necessary is simply to get the evidence in one case. Such evidence has been tendered, and I now in open Senate tender the evidence to the Department of Justice. I agree to make it good and to produce a man who will walk into court and say over his own signature that he shot the birds and that he shot them on a given day in the State of Missouri; but with that sort of a case they do not dare to go to trial.

It is absurd to ask for money to enforce a law when the man who is named to enforce it says himself he wants to keep out of court. The migratory-bird law does not need a special appropriation. If it is a valid law, it can be enforced under the general appropriations. The truth is there has been a campaign made here by telegrams; Senators have been flooded with them; they have been told that a lot of men wanted to destroy the game, that such men are "game hogs," and you have been led to believe that certain men are the enemies of bird protection. The fact of the matter is that the men in my State who have been so characterized by Mr. Hornaday have been the men who have spent their time and their money in having put upon the statutes of the State of Missouri valid and binding game laws of a very stringent character. They are men who were instrumental in passing a law there which absolutely prohibited the killing of game for, I think, some three or four years; they are the men who are ready to stand back of an honest enforcement of any valid law that can be brought forward; but they recognize the fact that if you have an unconstitutional law upon the statute books it will be disregarded, and the result will be that you break down the respect of the people for the game laws.

These men recognize another fact, that if you are properly to protect the migratory birds you must proceed within the limits of the States, and that a State, having no jurisdiction beyond its borders, can only protect the game when that game comes within its borders; but at the same time these men who want to protect bird life and who belong to associations interested in the protection of bird life can easily secure, and have indeed to a large extent secured, the enactment of laws in States that lie within the same general zone, which give protection at the proper season of the year to migratory birds which pass over that zone.

These men are not game hogs. These men want to pursue the right path. These men rise to protest and say that every day you waste with a law upon the statute books that will ultimately be stricken down is that much time lost in the proper prosecution of a plan which will result in the protection of game.

Mr. President, I insist that the utmost that ought to be granted is $20,000; and so far as I am concerned, I think the item ought to be stricken out altogether. It is a strange thing to be asking Congress to appropriate $50,000 of the people's money when both of the factions charged with the enforcement of this law refuse to move. It is a strange thing to ask for the appropriation of $50,000 for a purpose of this kind, when the best the author of the bill himself can say is that he thinks now the bill will be constitutional provided we negotiate a treaty with foreign powers and in some mysterious way breathe the life of constitutionality into the dead form of a statute that was born dead.

If the desire is to enact a statute of this kind, it ought to be preceded, not by a treaty, but by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

So far as I am concerned, I am looking at this question from a broader standpoint, and I hope with a clearer light, than is involved in even the question of constitutionality. We have come to this sort of situation in our country—that every man who wants to have any kind of legislation or accomplish any kind of result comes here to Congress. We have a government of boards and of commissions that have taken over to themselves the powers that were formerly exercised by Congress or by some one of the several States. We undertake, or are asked to undertake, to prescribe the qualifications for voters. We are asked now to undertake to regulate, if not the habit and flight of the birds, at least the habit of the citizen of the State. Then, when you ask a learned Senator, who has given the bill months of his time and consideration, to put his finger on the clause of the Constitution of the United States which gives us that power, he answers that he can not put it upon any clause, but just in a general way he puts his hands upon the whole of the Constitution and upon the treaty-making power of the Government. We are now asked to conclude that a sovereign State can no longer regulate the killing of game within its borders, because we are about to give the Constitution some new construction or new meaning or new extension by making a treaty with Great Britain. If we will just make enough treaties, after a while we will not have any Constitution left.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEST. Might we not take away the rights of a State, as in California, by making treaties in reference to citizenship?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that opens up a rather broad field; but as far as I am concerned I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the State of California had the right to say to the Japanese, to the Chinaman, or to any other alien: "You can not vote and you can not exercise other rights which our citizens possess." I never had any doubt of that. I hope the day will never come when the Senate of the United States and the President can make a treaty that will take away the sovereign rights of the good old State of Georgia, or the rights of the State of Missouri, or the rights of any other State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. McLEAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair as on the previous vote, and withhold my vote.

So Mr. GORE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 13, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 12, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the disclosures Thou hast made of Thyself in the great book of nature, in the written word, in the marvelous progress of the race toward the higher civilization. Continue, we beseech Thee, Thy providence, a potent influence in the affairs of men, that evil may diminish, good increase, till all the world shall know Thee, worship Thee, and praise Thy holy name. That Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from yesterday is the District of Columbia tax bill, H. R. 12873, on which the previous question was ordered yesterday.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The parliamentary inquiry I wish to make is whether there is one amendment or whether there are two amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to report that there was one.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, there were two amendments, but I have no objection to their being considered as one if it is so understood.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, there was only one amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER]. The amendment to the substitute was agreed to and the substitute as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. There was also an amendment striking out the remainder of the bill.

Mr. ADAIR. I beg the gentleman's pardon, that was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. It was nevertheless an amendment. However, I am perfectly willing that it should be considered as one amendment. There was an amendment striking out all after section 1.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not quite understand.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, there was an amendment agreed to in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill on the reading of section 1. After that, by unanimous consent, there was another amendment agreed to, striking out the rest of the bill, beginning with section 2.

Mr. ADAIR. The gentleman from Illinois is correct.

The SPEAKER. Then there are two amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MANN. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment adopting the substitute.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not now in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in order that the Speaker may correctly understand the situation, it is this: The bill as originally introduced was reported back to the House with sundry amendments. As soon as the first section of the bill was read the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] offered a substitute by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting certain matter thereafter. After the gentleman from Ohio had offered his substitute I offered an amendment to that substitute, striking out all except the first word thereof and inserting other matter in lieu of that in the substitute. My amendment to the substitute was adopted in Committee of the Whole, and then that substitute as amended was adopted. That is the situation. Then the remainder of the bill was stricken out by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. What was the Crosser substitute for—the whole bill or a part of it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It was a substitute for the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky go to the whole bill, too?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. All except one word.

The SPEAKER. What was the reason for the amendment striking out certain parts of the bill?

Mr. MANN. These provisions were offered when section 1 was read, and notice was given that if agreed to the gentleman would move to strike out the rest of the bill section by section, and then, by unanimous consent, it was stricken out as one amendment. It does not make a particle of difference, except to have it straight on the record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that there is only one amendment. After the Johnson substitute was agreed to, if that covered the whole bill, the Chair does not see what the necessity was of a motion to strike out any other section, because it had all been swallowed up in the substitute.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, the bill had not been read.

The SPEAKER. Then there are two amendments pending here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Speaker will please bear in mind that the Crosser substitute as amended is a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing, if the gentleman asks unanimous consent, that it shall be considered as an amendment to the entire bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am putting the proposition to the Chair for his ruling thereon.

The SPEAKER. If the Johnson amendment to the Crosser substitute was adopted, that is one thing. If another amendment was offered to strike out certain sections of the bill, that is another thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The other sections necessarily went out.

The SPEAKER. What was the use or propriety of making a motion to strike them out. It was a complete surplusage, if the gentleman's amendment and the Crosser substitute covered the whole bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the situation would be identically as suggested if the House should agree to the Johnson amendment; but suppose the House should not agree to the Johnson amendment, then it would be for the House to determine whether it would strike out the rest of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in order to get the thing straight on the record, I ask unanimous consent that the Johnson amendment be considered as an entire substitute for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the Johnson amendment be considered as one amendment to the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] demands a division, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for a division.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman withdrawing the demand for a division.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] desires a vote. If he withdraws his demand for a division, we will have to have two votes. If he lets the House divide, we will get the automatic roll, and the House will vote when the roll is called.

Mr. MANN. It will in any event, because the question has been submitted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the question has been submitted to the House, and upon that it appeared evident that a quorum did not answer. Thereupon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] asked for a division in continuation of the vote which had been partially taken. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The question that arises in my mind now is this: Is the status such that whenever this vote is now taken, it will be taken by a call of the yeas and nays?

Mr. GARNER. Assuredly.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly. It is an automatic call.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is what I am after.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count to determine if there is a quorum present. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Suppose the gentleman from Ohio withdraws his demand for a division, will the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. No; because I want an automatic roll call.

The SPEAKER (after counting). One hundred and sixty-five Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. When the roll is called those in favor of the amendment which was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole as a substitute will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 131, nays 165, answered "present" 9, not voting 128, as follows:

For the session:

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye" when my name was called. Under Rule VIII I am inclined to think I ought not to vote, and I wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. HARDY was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, is a motion in order now to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What is to be the third reading? What is the bill now as it stands?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand what the gentleman from Illinois said.

Mr. MANN. What is it we are going to vote upon now?

The SPEAKER. Why, upon the original bill.

Mr. MANN. A further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The original bill was reported to the House by the committee with sundry amendments. Those amendments were not agreed to in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Now, is the vote upon the original bill without those amendments?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that is the situation.

Mr. MANN. Well, I agree with the Chair, although that is not important.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOSTER. The House having voted down the substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, does the vote now come upon the Crosser amendment?

The SPEAKER. Why, the vote comes on the original George bill.

Mr. FOSTER. With the amendments reported by the committee?

The SPEAKER. The amendments were not agreed to, and the House on the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has to do only with amendments which were agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, does this vote which has just been taken dispose of both the Johnson and Crosser amendments?

The SPEAKER. Of course it does; it knocks them clear out of existence.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If the House should adopt the bill as reported from the committee, it would not include the committee amendments, and on the third reading of the bill, if the House desired to adopt the committee amendments, it could recommit the bill with instructions to bring in the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. Of course it could.

Mr. MANN. Ah, but I take it, if the gentleman from Kentucky or anybody else opposed to the George bill should move to recommit the bill to the District Committee, that would be in order.

The SPEAKER. Of course it would; there is no question on earth about it. The question is on the engrossment and third reading——

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OGLESBY. The proposition now being the original bill, is it in order to vote on that when it has never been read? The original bill was never read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with what was done in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. All of the rest of the bill is stricken out by unanimous consent and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union makes a report here that certain transactions occurred in the committee, and he reported that the committee had had under consideration this bill and had directed him to report it back with an amendment or amendments, as the case may have been, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill do pass. A vote has been taken on the amendment, and it has been voted down, and that clears out the Johnson amendment, clears out the Crosser substitute, clears out the committee amendments, and leaves the naked original George bill to be voted on.

Mr. OGLESBY. The original George bill has never been read.

The SPEAKER. It does not make a bit of difference whether it has or not. The first paragraph of it was read. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it; the noes had it.

So the third reading was rejected.

The SPEAKER. That ends this absolutely. [Laughter and applause.]

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the third reading was refused, was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CALLAWAY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. On what?

Mr. CARY. On the District bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill just voted on. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What is it, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks to extend his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PROHIBITION AMENDMENT.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file minority views (H. Rept. 652, pt. 2) on House joint resolution No. 168. The majority report was filed some days ago, and I was not informed of that fact. I would like to have the privilege of submitting my views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] asks unanimous consent to file his views on House joint resolution No. 168. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what the resolution is.

Mr. DUPRÉ. It is a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] on the subject of prohibition.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did the majority make a report?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I am not in a position to answer that question. They have submitted the bill to the House without recommendation.

Mr. MANN. The report was made to the House and is in print. It contains only three or four lines.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I do not know whether it is a report or not.

The SPEAKER. They made a report and it has been printed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield further?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is a good deal of mystery about what occurred in the committee. Did the gentleman take a position——

The SPEAKER. That is against the rules of the House.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The "gentleman from Louisiana" will protect himself against an inquiry of that kind.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the gentleman's report?

Mr. DUPRÉ. If the gentleman will look at it, he will know what it is.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it for or against the resolution?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I do not think that is a matter of concern. I simply ask the privilege of submitting these views, and I do not propose to tell the gentleman from Kansas what they are.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will read the report and find out, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUPRÉ. If you will allow it to be printed, you will find out.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not object. I am anxious to see the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Harter Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just disposed of—the District tax bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the District tax bill, which has just been disposed of. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT AT BROOKLYN.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD the address delivered by the President of the United States at the Brooklyn Navy Yard on yesterday relative to the memory of the sailor dead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] asks unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD the speech made by the President of the United States yesterday in New York at the funeral of the sailors and marines. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[The President's address appears in the Senate proceedings of to-day.]

PUBLIC BUILDING, SALISBURY, MD.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill S. 4158, a similar House bill, H. R. 13611, being on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield. The gentleman states it will take only five minutes or less to dispose of that, and he will agree to withdrawing it if it takes more than five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4158) to reduce the fire limit required by the act approved March 4, 1913, in respect to the proposed Federal Building at Salisbury, Md.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to disregard the provisions contained in the public building act approved March 4, 1913, requiring 40 feet open space for fire protection about the proposed Federal building at Salisbury, Md., or to reduce the space required thereby to such an extent as he may deem necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is this bill on the House Calendar?

Mr. COVINGTON. It is. A similar bill is on the House Calendar, with a favorable report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANN. Is it on the House Calendar or the Union Calendar?

Mr. COVINGTON. It is on the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN. That is not where it belongs.

Mr. COVINGTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken. It is properly on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill, H. R. 13611, of similar tenor, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the privileged resolution which I offered be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 503, House report 666.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2860, and the same shall be the continuing order of the House until disposed of; that there shall be not exceeding one hour's general debate on the bill, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill, one-half of such time to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], and the other half to be controlled by any Member opposing. At the end of such general debate the bill shall be read for amendment.

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman desire any time for discussing the rule? I can explain it.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CARY. I would like to be informed what this bill is.

The SPEAKER. This bill provides for the election of United States Senators in the States.

Mr. HENRY. I was just going to explain. This bill provides for the election of United States Senators only until various States can pass laws on the subject. It is a temporary expedient, to serve only until the legislatures convene in regular order and take action. The bill to be considered is the Senate bill, which was passed on February 11, 1914. If this bill is not passed at this session of Congress, it will be necessary for the governors in many States to call their legislatures in special sessions in order to provide election laws to select United States Senators under the new constitutional amendment which was proclaimed on May 31, 1913, as having been ratified.

It is necessary for Congress to act now in order to avoid a great deal of inconvenience, and this rule simply brings before the House the Senate measure for consideration. It provides one hour for general debate, and provides for reading the bill under the five-minute rule, and of course under that the time is not limited and the opportunity of amendment is thrown wide open, so that any gentleman may offer an amendment to the measure.

That explains fully all there is in the proposition, and therefore I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will not the gentleman wait?

Mr. HENRY. I withhold my motion for a moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. What time is to be given on the rule?

Mr. HENRY. How much time do you want?

Mr. MANN. Ten minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would want about seven minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the rule is as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and is reported for the purpose of enabling the House at the earliest date possible to provide for the election of United States Senators in certain States where the laws do not now provide for election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. It is one question on which I am glad to say to the House there is no difference in the committee as to the wisdom of the legislation proposed.

I regret, however, that it becomes necessary to appeal to the Committee on Rules for special rules to enable the House to legislate upon matters of grave importance. It was thought a few years ago that we had put the House in possession of rules that would enable it automatically to do the people's will. That has not been done, and in order that the matter may be elaborated in due form, I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is recognized.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will ask how much time was yielded to me?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill, and I think it should pass. But the manner in which it comes before the House gives rise to some thoughts in me which I am going to undertake to express in the next eight minutes.

This is a new departure—the proposal of this rule—for the consideration of a bill of this character, for this bill is on the calendar and normally should be reached without the aid of a special rule. But the rule is invoked. What a difference there is on the majority side of this House in conditions now and a year ago. Probably 100 Democrats came into the new Congress a year ago determined upon a career of independent, free political thinking. But you are no longer free. You are bound and gagged. A year ago there were 100 or more independent Democrats—mostly young—on that side who were eager for public service. Now they are helpless creatures of a machine. A year ago there were scores of Democrats across this aisle who were willing when the people asked them to go a mile to go with them twain. Now these forward-looking, independent men find themselves negligible in the conduct of public affairs.

You permitted yourselves as individual Representatives to be bound a year ago by a caucus, and you are paying the penalty to-day as individuals by a loss of your freedom. You permitted yourselves to be bound then on the theory that a great legislative program was to be put through. You passed a tariff act which has not so much as pried loose a single finger tip of the strangle hold the special interests have upon this country. You passed a currency bill that has not and will not remove from private and selfish control the credits of this land. You are about to take up trust legislation—trust legislation which will make this Nation travel the old circle, the old futile circle of legal delay, over again.

Now, you have reached this point: Your calendars are clogged. You have got 66 bills on the Calendar for Discharge Motions. There is no individual in this body who can reach the Discharge Calendar. You have a Unanimous Consent Calendar, under which twice every month we see gentlemen here rise and propose to put needed measures through, and after long and often useless discussions, are beaten by the whim of some single objecting Member. In this situation you are at the mercy of your leadership. You have no power left in the individual on the majority side. There is not one individual who can now reach, of his own motion, any bill on the calendar unless it is privileged, save by unanimous consent. You can not get it out of committee by discharging the committee. You can not reach the Discharge Calendar. By a majority vote and under your leadership, you, of the majority, clogged up Calendar Wednesday with an unimportant but voluminous bill, and you are going to occupy it by that useless measure for the rest of this session. You have practically nullified the call of committees in this House; that is, you have shut yourselves off from the Discharge Calendar; you have crippled Calendar Wednesday; and you have left yourselves the pitiable recourse of unanimous consent; virtually no recourse at all.

Now, what about it? Is it of any moment to you or your country that you have surrendered your freedom? Look at it concretely. What about the national prohibition amendment? It is on the calendar. Can you reach it? Is there a single individual here who can reach that proposition by motion? No. You are dependent upon the Committee on Rules. You can act only by its grace. If the Committee on Rules does not give you a rule for the consideration of the prohibition amendment, it will not be considered.

Do you young Democrats who came here a year ago, filled with the fire of political independence, arrogate to yourselves the function of standing between the people of this country and their right to vote to change their Constitution? Well, you have done it by your surrender of independence.

What about the presidential primary? Do you remember that the President of the United States came here in December last and asked for prompt action upon the proposition of the national presidential primary? Where is the bill providing for it? Is there a single member of the majority that can reach the matter of a presidential primary? Can you discharge the committee to which it was referred and which has not reported upon it? No. And if you had it on the calendar you could not reach it.

You have hog-tied yourselves. You have become parts of a machine that has cut each of you off to a Procrustean length, made you all of equal futility in helplessness. You have surrendered your individual rights as Representatives, and you have surrendered along with them the rights of the people.

You have called a caucus to decide on the program on the Democratic side for to-night. It is for the ostensible purpose of forming a program. It is, in fact, for no such purpose at all. It is for the old, old purpose of putting the gag in your mouth and of binding you about with the whipcords by which leadership controls you. I would like to see a sufficient number of the independent thinking Democrats in this House enter that caucus to-night and start a revolt against it. I devoutly wish some one in the Democratic caucus to-night, in behalf of the people of the United States, would rise up and offer a motion again to open that caucus to the people, making it a free, an open caucus, and then we would know what the caucus does—whether it is called merely for the purpose of gagging and binding you or whether it is called for the purpose of giving the people of the United States, through their Representatives, the right to reach remedial legislation. A gentleman sitting by me here says, "And do not forget suffrage." I do not forget suffrage; and I do not forget the seamen's bill, the presidential primary bill, and a score of meritorious measures which you, through the surrender of your independence, have withdrawn from the right of consideration by the Representatives of the people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I hardly know how to account for the outburst of the distinguished gentleman from Kansas. I do not understand it. When he was elected leader of his small minority, I looked forward to some great work on the floor of this House, and congratulated myself that the people would have a real leader here; but as the issues have come up, and the Democratic administration and the Democratic Party have presented matters for the benefit of the people, I have been grieved to see the gentleman sometimes line up on the side of the special interests and play politics. I was sorry to see those things. Now, if he will cease playing politics, if he will follow his conscience and vote as he should on all occasions, we will not lose confidence in him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, will report out the Hobson amendment, I will continue my confidence in him. If he will report out the amendment for suffrage, I will continue my confidence in him. I have always subscribed to the progressive qualities of the gentleman from Texas. He is one of the independent Democrats to whom I have alluded, and I hope to God that he will throw off his party shackles and get down to business for the people. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman need not be alarmed about suffrage, or prohibition, or any other question. The Committee on Rules, as the agent of the Democratic Party and the caucus, will bring in rules whenever it is properly directed to do so.

Mr. MURDOCK rose.

Mr. HENRY. Wait a moment. When we have finished the program, the record of the Democratic Party will be so good that instead of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] or some other Republican coming to the Senate of the United States from Kansas, the people will elect a man like GEORGE A. NEELEY from that State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Sit down for just a little while. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HENRY. We want you to behave a little better than you have been behaving lately. You started out all right, and seemed to be patriotic, but you have played too much politics, and you will not get anywhere in that way. The trouble with you is that, like some of the players out at the ball games, you keep your head in the grandstand too much. [Applause and laughter.] Mr. Speaker, personally, I think a great deal of the gentleman from Kansas. He need not be alarmed about what the Democratic Party are going to do. We are going to carry out our program, and we are going to do it in due season. We are not going to gag or throttle anyone. We are going to bring into this House every matter that should come before it, and give the Democrats a chance to vote, and let your side have an opportunity to vote, and to put you on record. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You are not as anxious to go on record about these things as you indicate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, we always vote for a record vote, and we do not have to go into a secret caucus to be directed how to do it.

Mr. HENRY. I know; but you have made some records that you will wish you could blot out before the next election has passed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple proposition, and I have not said anything about it to arouse the gentleman. He bucks like a broncho with a cockle burr under the saddle blanket. [Laughter.] We throw this bill wide open to amendment. You have unlimited time to speak on those amendments, and I hope you will offer your amendments, provided you do not offer one to elect yourself to the Senate from the State of Kansas. [Laughter.] Of course, that would not be in order, but you can talk as long as you want to, and offer as many amendments as you wish. Now, I am going to watch you closely hereafter and hope you will vote on the side of the people. I do not want to see men like you get away from the people.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. I yield for a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will not the gentleman oblige me and live up to his lights by leading a revolt in the Democratic caucus and vote for an open caucus? That would gratify me greatly.

Mr. HENRY. I will stand on the side of the people every time, and will stand with this administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is the best administration that this country has had since the Civil War. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MURDOCK again rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HENRY. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. If there is a conflict between the caucus and the people, with whom does the gentleman stand?

Mr. HENRY. Why, there can never be any conflict between the Democratic caucus and the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will yield again, I should like to say that a majority of the people of the United States would like the Democratic caucus to-night to request the Committee on Rules to bring in the Hobson amendment. How will the gentleman stand on that?

Mr. HENRY. The trouble about the gentleman from Kansas is that he speaks for too many parties. He speaks for the Republican Party, for the discoverer of rivers in South America——

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; I do, for him.

Mr. HENRY. He speaks for the Democratic Party, and he assumes to speak for every party, even the suffrage and prohibition factions in all parties.

Mr. MURDOCK. I speak for the independent Democrats and the independent Republicans and the Progressives, who in time will amalgamate in this country and clean out the Democrats and their secret caucus and the Rules Committee. Just give us time.

Mr. HENRY. I will say that as amalgamators you did not succeed very well in the last election, and I do not think you will amalgamate much with any one in 1914 or 1916.

Mr. MURDOCK. We are not attempting to amalgamate either the stand-pat Democrats or the stand-pat Republicans. We want the independent element of all parties, and I will say to the gentleman that we are going to get that element North and South.

Mr. HENRY. The disparity between what the gentleman wants and what he will get is so great that it is hardly worth while to discuss it further here to-day. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

NOMINATION AND ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 2860, providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That at the regular election held in any State next preceding the expiration of the term for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress, at which election a Representative to Congress is regularly by law to be chosen, a United States

Senator from said State shall be elected by the people thereof for the term commencing on the 4th day of March next thereafter.

SEC. 2. That in any State wherein a United States Senator is hereafter to be elected either at a general election or at any special election called by the executive authority thereof to fill a vacancy, until or unless otherwise specially provided by the legislature thereof, the nomination of candidates for such office shall be made, the election to fill the same conducted, and the result thereof determined, as near as may be in accordance with the laws of such State regulating the nomination of candidates for and election of Members at Large of the National House of Representatives: Provided, That in case no provision is made in any State for the case of the nomination or election of Representatives at Large, the procedure shall be in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State: And provided further, That in any case the candidate for Senator receiving the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected.

With the following committee amendments:

Amend, in line 10, page 2, by striking out the words "the case of."

Amend, in lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, page 2, by striking out the words "in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "the same as that provided for the nomination and election of governor of such State."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that one-half of the time shall be controlled by some one opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill?

Mr. RUCKER. I think not.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule 30 minutes of this time is to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], and 30 minutes by some gentleman opposed to the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY], may control one-half of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY], ranking Republican member on the committee, control one-half the time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am going to consume but a very few minutes in explaining this bill. Let me say to the House that it is a Senate bill and relates solely to the election of United States Senators. The Senate passed the bill, and with one or two verbal changes the House has reported it. The bill on its face was intended and does propose a purely temporary measure.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman desire to yield for a question at this point?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill as indicated by the title seems to be a temporary measure, and yet the first section of the bill would seem to be permanent law.

Mr. RUCKER. I will get to that.

Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I believe I will answer the question that he is going to ask.

Mr. COOPER. I wanted to ask a different question from that suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming. It seems to me there may be danger of very serious complication growing out of the proviso beginning on line 9, page 2, which provides that if there is no election in the State for Representative at Large the procedure shall be the same as that provided for the nomination and election of the governor of the State, and, provided further, that in any case the candidate for Senator receiving the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected. Now, I asked the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] if the law in that State did not provide that if at an election the candidate for governor did not receive a clear majority the election of governor was thrown into the legislature, and he said yes. Now, the second proviso provides that in case a candidate for Senator receives the highest number of votes he shall be deemed elected. Does that mean votes in the legislature? If you are going to regulate it in the State of Vermont by the present law of the State, the Senator would be elected as the present governor is elected. The gentleman from Vermont states that the present governor, if he does not have a majority, is elected by the legislature.

Mr. RUCKER. This bill would adopt the laws of the State and make them applicable to the election of a Senator until the legislature passes a law which would put into operation the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. COOPER. Would that be constitutional; would it be in accordance with the amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by direct vote of the people? You put in the bill one or two provisos which, in the State of Vermont, would throw the election into the legislature.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not think so; I think the construction necessarily is that they would be elected under the law with reference to the qualification of voters, election returns, and, in brief, all things connected with such election would be in accordance with State law, but under no circumstances would the election go into the legislature.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, in Vermont the people vote for governor and it takes a majority vote to elect. If there is no majority, the election is thrown into the legislature. Does the gentleman remember what the constitutional provision is as to that? Does the constitutional provision require a majority or a plurality to elect a Senator?

Mr. RUCKER. It does not say.

Mr. MANN. I thought it did not. This provision as it is in the bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, might be in violation of the constitutional amendment which requires the election to be by a vote of the people. This bill requires that the election shall be conducted in the same manner as elections of other officials or the governor. In Vermont it requires a majority to elect a governor, and there being no majority the legislature elects the governor. That could not be done in reference to a United States Senator.

Mr. RUCKER. This bill has a proviso that in any case the candidate for Senator receiving the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected.

Mr. MANN. This bill provides for the election of a Senator by plurality.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; and it was carefully considered by distinguished lawyers in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I think that is correct, and I think that would end that contention.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will, although I hope the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. MONDELL. It occurs to me that the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin could hardly follow under this bill, for the reason that, in lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 2 of the bill, provides that the nomination for candidates for such offices shall be made and the election to follow the same shall be conducted and the result be determined in accordance with the laws of the State, and then follows the provision that the Senator receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected. In other words, the provisions following the State law are provisions in regard to the character of the nomination and in regard to the manner of having the election and the manner of declaring the result.

Mr. RUCKER. It merely makes the State law control in that matter.

Mr. MONDELL. But it would not permit the State law to throw the election into the legislature.

Mr. RUCKER. Not at all.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Would the Senator in any State be elected by the old method of procedure by the legislature?

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, no; if this bill passes, no Senator can be elected by a legislature. But let me say, before I take my seat—and I will not be able to discuss the question at length, because there are some gentlemen in the House now who have been nominated for Senator in their States, and some question has arisen as to whether or not this bill might not complicate the nominations which have already taken place.

In order to make it clear that it will not do so, at the proper time I propose to offer an amendment in line 4, page 2, so as to make the bill read:

The nomination of candidates for such office not heretofore made shall be made—

And so forth.

A question has arisen in the minds of some gentlemen again as to whether or not the first section would not become permanent law, and in order to avoid any possible confusion, and responding to what I believe is the wish of the Senate in doing so, I propose at the proper time to offer as an amendment a new section, to be numbered 3, to provide that this act shall expire by limitation at the end of three years from the date of its approval, so as to make it absolutely certain that it is a temporary measure and that no provision in it is to become permanent law.

Unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question, I merely repeat that this is a Senate bill in which every Senator is profoundly interested and to which the Senate has given careful consideration. I hope that it will pass the House without dissent.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. In the first section of the bill the bill is made to apply, apparently, to only those elections at which a Representative in Congress is to be chosen. Are there any elections for Senators that are not coincident with the election of Representatives in Congress?

Mr. RUCKER. I think not. If this act passes, it will fix the time of election the same as the time when the election of Representatives in Congress is held. Of course every Congressman has to be elected this year.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not think that Senators in any case are elected in off years?

Mr. RUCKER. I think not.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think not, either, but the matter just occurred to me.

Mr. RUCKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I received this morning a copy of the Seattle Sun, of May 7, in which appeared the following statement:

A telegram has been received from ROBERT L. HENRY, chairman of the House Rules Committee, saying he will do all in his power to advance the legislations needed for the direct election. However, officials here doubt if action will be taken soon enough.

The governor has but little time and writs of election to fill the three vacancies in the legislature will probably be issued soon. Senator White, of Whatcom County, and Representatives Brislawn, of Lincoln, and Langford, of Pierce, having resigned since the last session.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter and a copy of two telegrams from the governor of the State of Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

OLYMPIA, WASH., April 27, 1914.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Is there anything new in relation to bill covering election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people? The time is approaching when it will be necessary to call the special session of our legislature unless bill is passed by Congress. Thanking you for reply.

ERNEST LISTER, Governor.

STATE OF WASHINGTON,
OFFICE OF GOVERNOR,
Olympia, April 30, 1914.

Hon. J. A. FALCONER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FALCONER: I am wiring you to-night as now confirmed herewith:

"Unless bill providing method for direct election of United States Senators is passed by Congress within a short time, our State will be under necessity of calling special session of legislature to make proper provision. Will it be possible to get early action?"

Sincerely, yours,

ERNEST LISTER, Governor.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, the Legislature of the State of Washington adjourned upon or about the same day that the last State necessary to adopt this amendment agreed to it, and it will cost our State over $30,000 to call a special session of the legislature. As suggested in the press article, a number of members of the legislature have resigned, and that will necessitate special elections to fill legislative vacancies, besides the inconvenience of calling a special session of the legislature. The people in our State at this time of the year are too busy with business matters to give much time to State legislation, and it is the general sentiment of the entire people of our State that the Congress should pass this bill. It should be done immediately, because the time for filing nominations for United States Senator in our State, under the provisions of our laws, opens this year on the 8th day of July and closes on the 8th day of August, so the time now is somewhat limited.

Mr. Speaker, we stand for the direct election of United States Senators. For many years our people demanded popular government, and the advanced legislation now on the statute books indicate that our State is alert and active in forcing progressive legislation.

In 1907 a direct-primary law for the election of public officers was enacted, and if we pass this bill—Senate 2860, by Senator MILES POINDEXTER—which came to this House early in February, we will take advantage of our direct-primary bill to elect a United States Senator this year—1914.

Mr. Speaker, I have given considerable time to the consideration of this bill. Since it passed the Senate it has been considered in a general way by gentlemen for and against. The imaginary infringement on State rights feature has been urged by gentlemen, but I here want to thank those gentlemen for their eminent fairness in not insisting on opposing the passage of this bill to-day. And, sir, in behalf of the people of my State, I want to thank Judge RUCKER, Mr. HENRY, and the Rules Committee in advancing the bill for consideration and aiding in its final passage.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY], I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is an illustration, it seems to me, of the value of the contest which this side waged for some time on the adoption of the constitutional amendment. Gentlemen will recall that when the constitutional amendment resolution was reported to the House it provided for the elimination entirely of the control of Congress over the election of Senators, Congress then having control under the Constitution to a certain extent over the election of Senators and Representatives in Congress. The constitutional amendment proposed by the committee and as it passed the House proposed to eliminate entirely the control of Congress over the election of Senators. Fortunately the Senate did not agree to that proposition, and for a long time that constitutional amendment resolution was pending in the conference committee in a deadlock, the Democratic House maintaining the position that it would not permit the resolution to pass unless it included an amendment removing the control of Congress over the election of Senators and the Republican Senate maintaining the position that it was necessary that Congress should retain control.

I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], now in charge of this bill, is deserving of a compliment for the position which he took in reference to that senatorial amendment resolution. After the two Houses had been in disagreement for a considerable length of time, and while his side of the House—I believe the majority of it—was still in favor of refusing to pass the resolution as it passed the Senate, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] rose above ordinary partisanship and said that he was in favor of the amendment to the Constitution as it came from the Senate, and the result was that the House yielded upon that matter through the influence of the gentleman from Missouri. We then passed the resolution, and the amendment is now a part of the Constitution.

After several contests growing out of that constitutional amendment we have now before us a bill to enact a law by Congress regulating the manner and method of electing Senators under that constitutional amendment. This bill of itself, unopposed, favored practically by everybody in this House, is proof that the Republican side of the House was right when it insisted upon keeping in the Constitution the provision giving Congress the control over the election of Senators, and the passage of this bill is not only proof of the justice of the position taken by the Republican Senate and by the Republican side of the House, but is also a justification of the final position taken by our distinguished friend from Missouri, who caused the resolution to pass the House and who is now in charge of this bill. I take off my hat to the gentleman from Missouri. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, although my State has already enacted the necessary legislation, I am glad to support the pending bill, Senate 2860, which provides a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators in those States whose legislatures have not convened since the ratification of the constitutional amendment providing that Senators should hereafter be chosen by the people of the several States.

I have always strongly favored the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, supporting the joint resolution which passed this House on April 13, 1911. [Applause.] Since this amendment has been in effect Senators have been chosen in the States of Maryland and Georgia and nominated in Alabama and South Dakota, and in each instance this new method of allowing the people a voice in selecting Members of the upper branch of Congress has worked most satisfactorily. It has been demonstrated that the people are as capable of choosing United States Senators as the members of the various legislatures.

We no longer read of deadlocks in the various States to the detriment of public business. I was a member of the California Legislature during one of the bitterest senatorial contests in the history of that State, extending through a regular and extra session, and seriously interfering with public business. In many of the States there have been scandals which caused the people to lose faith in the legislative method of selection.

Candidates for this high office must not only face the people at a primary election but at a general election as well. This affords the electorate of every State the opportunity of becoming thoroughly familiar with the public records and qualifications of candidates. The Senator chosen is now directly responsible to the individual citizen. Candidates must take the people into their confidence. Under the old method the voter frequently felt that he did not have sufficient voice in the selection, and that in too many instances those chosen represented special interests. Of course there were many exceptions.

No candidate whose record is clean, who is independent, and whose sole ambition is to render faithful public service need fear to face the intelligent, honest, and patriotic voters of any State in the Union. [Applause.] When a selection is made greater satisfaction will be manifested, because the people will feel, whether the candidate of their choice is selected or not, that the will of the majority has prevailed. [Applause.]

I ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD the California law governing the election and nomination of United States Senators.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WEAVER). The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I will ask the gentleman if the State of California has provided by its legislature the means of electing United States Senators?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. It has, both as to the general and primary elections.

Mr. SLOAN. I am very much pleased to hear that, because I understand the senior Senator from the State of California has announced that he will not be a candidate for reelection; and combined with that fact is an opportunity for the Golden State to elect a man who will become a great Senator from the State of California [applause] and whom I now address.

We know that the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] in his 10 years' service in this House has distinguished himself among his colleagues, who admire and honor him as a faithful and forceful Representative and wise lawmaker. His ability, age, and experience peculiarly fit him for the high office which he seeks, and I know the Pacific Coast State could make no better selection. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Would the gentleman like any more time? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I herewith insert the California law governing the election of United States Senators by the people:

(Approved May 20, 1913; in effect Aug. 10, 1913.)

The people of the State of California do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 1332 and section 1333 of the Political Code of the State of California are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1332. Elections for Senators in Congress for full terms must be held at the general election, at which members of the legislature are elected, next preceding the commencement of the term to be filled.

"SEC. 1333. Elections to fill a vacancy in the term of a United States Senator must be held at the general election or any special election held throughout the State next succeeding the occurrence of such vacancy."

SEC. 2. Four new sections are hereby added to the Political Code of the State of California, to be numbered 1334, 1335, 1336, and 1337, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 1334. The clerk of each county, as soon as the statement of the vote of his county at such election is made out and entered on the records of the board of supervisors, must make a certified abstract of so much thereof as relates to the vote given for persons for Senators in Congress.

"SEC. 1335. The clerk must seal up such abstract, indorse it 'Congressional election returns for Senators in Congress,' and without delay transmit it by mail to the secretary of state.

"SEC. 1336. On the sixtieth day after the day of election, or as soon as the returns have been received from all of the counties of the State, if received within that time, the secretary of state must compare and estimate the votes given or cast for such persons for Senator and certify to the governor the person having the highest number of votes in the State as duly elected.

"SEC. 1337. The governor must, upon the receipt of such certificate, transmit to such person a certificate of his election, sealed with the great seal and attested by the secretary of state."

SEC. 3. An act entitled "An act providing for placing the names of candidates for United States Senator in Congress upon the official ballot at general elections, for counting, canvassing, and making returns of the votes therefor, providing the method of notifying the legislature of the results of such election, and defining the duties of certain officers in relation thereto," approved April 7, 1911, is hereby repealed.

I also give an extract from section 2 of the direct-primary law of California, approved June 16, 1913, which provides:

Party candidates for the office of United States Senator shall have their names placed on the official primary election ballots of their respective parties and shall be in all respects nominated in the manner herein provided for State officers.

Section 23 of the same act also provides:

The name of the person in each political party who receives at a primary election the highest number of votes for United States Senator shall also be placed on the official ballot under the heading "United States Senator."

Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, we are all, of course, for the direct election of United States Senators and for this bill; there is no question about that. The development of sentiment for the injecting of democracy into the United States Senate has been very pronounced and has been very emphatically approved by the people of this country, and no intelligent man would say he was opposed to that principle at this time. So far back as 1908 the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who might, with great unanimity of approval, be termed the dean of a large body of Progressive men here on this floor, introduced into the national Republican convention at Chicago a resolution providing for the incorporation into the Republican platform of a plank providing for the direct election of United States Senators. It received about 100 votes. It was not so very popular then, but later on it became popular enough to be adopted, and, as I said before, no one would think for a moment of opposing that method at this time.

Our fathers were not so particular about building the Constitution out of Democratic timber. They would have built it more after the fashion of a constitutional monarchy if they had been able to put over that kind of an instrument. They were more afraid of the people in those days than the Republican Party from Hanna to Hadley have been afraid of Theodore Roosevelt. They built the Constitution so electors would name the President, legislatures would name the Senators, Presidents would name the judges, and, finally, so the judges would have the divine (inherent) right to veto all that the President, the Senate, the legislatures, and the people might do, with the power to fine and jail for contempt without jury trial, indictment, or other safeguard, and on top of that judges were to serve for life without ever accounting to the people for their stewardship. After crawling into the hole they pulled the hole in after them by making it almost impossible to amend the Constitution. To encourage the people to adopt the Constitution they left State rights and local self-government as markers to designate the place where.

An awful war shot State rights out of the Constitution, and all of a sudden democracy, which is immortal in the human breast and can never die, began to resurrect itself from its temporary oblivion. Presidential electors became figureheads, and the people voted for the President and Vice President direct. The people are now prodding the party in power for presidential primaries. They will have presidential primaries, and there is no power conceivable that can stop them.

The people are revising the laws as to the judiciary, and the power of the court over all other branches of Government is sure to fall before the supreme and unconquerable power of real democracy. Legislatures have been compelled to give up their power to name United States Senators, so that the Senate is to become a palladium of democracy instead of a special-interest club.

There is another matter I wish to speak of here during the few minutes I have left. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] awhile ago spoke about matters that had to be brought up before the Democratic caucus to-night in order to have them considered by this Congress. I want to speak of one proposition that must be brought up, and which must be considered, in my opinion, in that caucus and put on the emergency roll, if it is to be considered by this House, and that is the seamen's bill. I am a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I have watched the progress of this bill, and I have been very deeply interested in it. Back in 1912, on August 3, a bill known as the seaman's bill passed this House and went over to the Senate. The Senate practically destroyed the bill by substituting the Burton subcommittee report and enacting what was not satisfactory to anybody; yet the House approved the Burton substitute, notwithstanding that fact, under the then circumstances. Even with that, President Taft vetoed it, or at least killed it by pocket veto. Then came the Democratic convention at Baltimore that stated that it was in favor of a seaman's bill that meant something—"not molasses to catch flies; our platform means business"—and this is the plank in that platform which they passed on this subject:

We urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of laws for the greater security of life and property at sea; and we favor the repeal of all laws, and the abrogation of so much of our treaties with other nations, as provide for the arrest and imprisonment of seamen charged with desertion or with violation of their contract of service. Such laws and treaties are un-American and violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution of the United States.

Senator LA FOLLETTE then took the original bill as it originally passed this House and introduced it in the Senate, and, with two or three minor amendments, caused it to be passed and sent over to the Democratic Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. No Democratic committee, or Republican committee either, gave the matter enough consideration to report a bill. Instead of the Democratic committee of this House reporting the bill, we find that here, on the 12th of May, approaching adjournment, that bill which was passed by the Senate and is before that committee has not been yet reported. It sleeps in a slumber which I fear will know no waking. I favor amending the bill so as to place Puget Sound, San Francisco Bay, and

New York Harbor on the same footing as to lifeboats and other matters, but I believe that there is an emergency involved in this matter. I believe if the committee pursues its course, which seems to be somewhat governed by the international treaty or agreement that has been framed at London, we are not going to have any seamen's bill at this session, and that, I say, rather than to permit that, this House should demand a report from the committee; that some steps should be taken by the House, if not by the Democratic caucus, to bring that bill to the front. It looks to me as if the bill is to be sidetracked; and as one on the inside, as a member of this committee who knows what is going on, I warn the friends of the bill, the friends of the seamen of the country; I warn the friends of labor, the friends of legislation for safety at sea, and all those who are interested in the bill; I warn them all, as one who knows how certainly that bill is being pocketed, how slowly it is being considered, that if public sentiment does not make itself felt and force action by that committee, no timely or adequate action will be taken, and the Democratic Party will again be convicted of violating its platform because of some English suggestion, some English convention, some English get-together of men who have different views about shipping than those which we have. The rights of the seamen ought to be respected. They ought to be considered in this matter, and as there are a great many things involved in this English shipping agreement that ought to be considered, they ought to be brought in in a separate bill. I want to warn the people of the country that something must be done to save the seamen's bill. The Democratic constitution said the seamen's rights were enshrined in the Constitution. We have about given away our property rights as to ships in the Panama Canal to English whims, but in the name of real Democracy, which I declare is immortal, we shall not allow England to tell us how to enforce human rights protected by our Constitution here on our own shores and in our own ports.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present and file views of some of the minority of the House Committee on the Judiciary with reference to the antitrust legislation bill. (H. Rept. 627, pt. 2.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] asks unanimous consent to file minority views. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. How much time has the other side remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifteen minutes on the other side.

Mr. RUCKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I almost feel like apologizing to the House for answering the suggestions made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. I was chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the last Congress and I am chairman of that committee in this Congress. That committee has under consideration what is known as the seamen's bill. In the last Congress I gave consideration to that bill, as did the members of my committee. It was reported to the House and passed. Subsequently it passed the Senate with amendments. The amendments were agreed to in the House, but the bill was pocketed by the President, much to my regret, although it was not in the form in which I wished to see it passed. I introduced a bill in the House in the present Congress, and Senator LA FOLLETTE introduced a copy of my bill in the Senate. So far as the seamen are concerned, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] may be their friend. I think I need not state to this House, as I think they have the evidence of the fact, that I have shown my friendship for the seamen, but I am not willing simply because of my friendship for the seamen to enact into law everything they want.

The bill introduced in the Senate at the first session of this Congress, which was a counterpart of the bill introduced in the House at the first session of this Congress, was reported to the Senate, and on the 23d day of October last passed the Senate. In December, and while I was absent in Europe attending the International Conference on Safety of Life at Sea, the House committee, Judge HARDY, of Texas, being acting chairman, had hearings on that bill, simply on the one feature of it, namely, the lifeboat provision. They found that that provision as it passed the Senate was in conflict with the sentiment on both coasts and on the Great Lakes. And I do not hesitate to say that it was unreasonable and unjust to the shipping interests of this country.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not at present. I have only five minutes. The committee was kind enough to postpone further hearings on the bill until I came home. I returned on the 29th of January. We immediately thereafter took up the bill and had hearings on the different features of it, and when those hearings were closed we took the bill up for consideration in the committee and day after day discussed its various features. There are only five members of the committee who served in the last Congress on the committee in this Congress. We have given the bill most patient consideration. The bill is now pending before a subcommittee, and the subcommittee is considering the bill with the utmost care, and have before them the proposition of whether or not they will accept the provision with reference to lifeboats and lifeboat men, as provided in the International Convention on Safety of Life, adopted at London. What they may do with it I do not know, but so far as any effort to smother that bill is concerned, it is untrue, and it is unworthy of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] to even intimate such a thing. He was so impatient this morning that he did not want to even consider that proposition.

Now, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is considering the London convention on safety of life at sea. I had a request from that committee not to report out the seamen's bill until they had considered the London convention. But notwithstanding their request, we are going ahead to consider the bill, and we expect to report it out at an early date. Whether we report it in the form already passed by the Senate, I do not care to prophesy, as I do not wish to anticipate the action of the committee, but I wish to say this, that it is being given thorough consideration. And if the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] will just open his mind and look at the provisions of the bill, and not from a political and local standpoint undertake to square himself with the seamen's union on the Pacific coast, maybe we will get a bill that will harmonize with common sense and justice toward every interest, the seamen included.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman will admit that the subcommittee never had a session until this morning—this 12th day of May—will he not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The subcommittee was appointed a week ago, and I undertook to group the provisions of the London convention on safety of life at sea for their consideration when the subcommittee met. I did so, and had them printed, and before the committee this morning, and I could hardly get the gentleman to remain to read them.

Mr. BRYAN. We have got to handle the whole concern yet.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We will handle it, too, if the gentleman will have patience.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think this country owes a debt of gratitude to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Judge ALEXANDER, on account of the fact that he has kept the seamen's bill in committee and is still considering it and having changes made in it from what it was when it came over to the House.

The seamen's bill, if it were passed as it came from the Senate, would largely destroy the shipping interests of this country, and would benefit no one except a few so-called sailors who do not think enough of this country to become naturalized. So far as I am concerned, I have reached a point where I refuse to shed tears for a class of men who do not think enough of this country to become citizens before they come and ask its protection and assistance.

And I want to say this much in regard to the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries: I have served with him for many years. I have never known a fairer-minded man. There is no man in Congress in either House that knows as much about the subjects involved in the seamen's bill as that distinguished chairman; and there is no man in Congress who is more worthy of the confidence and the esteem of this body than that gentleman. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word upon the bill under consideration while I am upon my feet. I am one who has been in favor of electing United States Senators by a direct vote of the people for many years, long before I became a Member of this body. Perhaps certain transactions which occurred in my own State many years ago impressed it on my attention. I have always voted, every time I had an opportunity, for a law looking to that end, and I am very glad that the little incipient filibuster that started the other day on that side of the House to prevent the consideration of this bill has evaporated; and I am very glad not only on account of my own State but also on account of others that that filibuster has ended and that the bill is now before the House. I want to extend my congratulations to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] who has had it in charge, for to him belongs great credit. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] is recognized.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes before the House with the unanimous report of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress, and no doubt will pass the House by a practically unanimous vote. The special rule which was brought in this morning to make the bill in order was made necessary on account of the condition of the calendar and on account of the action of the House a few weeks ago, as referred to by the gentleman from Washington, in voting to consider on Calendar Wednesday the bill to codify the laws relating to the judiciary.

It was necessary to adopt a special rule in order to pass the bill in the House at this session of Congress and have the law in operation before the fall election, when one-third of the membership of the Senate is to be elected. The bill to codify the laws relating to the judiciary contains 198 pages, and when the House voted to consider it on Calendar Wednesday it was generally recognized that that action would, in all probability, prevent the consideration of all other legislation on Calendar Wednesday for the remainder of the session. Of course it was well understood that there were some who hoped that that action would prevent the consideration altogether of this particular bill, providing for the election of United States Senators by the people, and after that action the only way that it could be brought up at this session was by the adoption of the special rule making it in order.

The way in which this amendment was adopted and the delay in having it incorporated into the Constitution serves as a striking illustration of how tardy Congress is at times in keeping up with the public sentiment of the country. There has been a law on the statute books of the State of Michigan for several years, as there has been in many other States of the Union, for the nomination and election of Senators by direct vote of the people. These laws were, of course, only advisory, and for many years before the passage of this amendment there had been an agitation all over the country for an amendment of this kind to the Constitution.

Several attempts were made in Congress to secure the passage of a resolution proposing such an amendment, but without success. After the resolution was passed by Congress, however, it was speedily adopted by the necessary three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States to make it a part of the Constitution. Only one year elapsed from the time the Clerk of the House deposited the resolution with the Secretary of State notifying that official of the action of Congress in passing it to the time when the Secretary of State certified that the amendment had been ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the 48 States of the Union, and had become a part of the Constitution of the United States.

I hold in my hand the certificate of the Secretary of State to that effect, dated the 31st day of May, 1913, and the original resolution was deposited with the Secretary of State on the 15th day of May, 1912. Taking into consideration the fact that most, if not all, of the legislatures of the different States do not meet until January, it will be seen that as a matter of fact the proposed amendment was ratified by the necessary number of States in much less than a year. This shows how readily the States adopt a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, when backed by urgent public sentiment. The States which ratified the resolution, according to the certificate of the Secretary of State, are as follows:

Massachusetts, Arizona, Minnesota, New York, Kansas, Oregon, North Carolina, California, Michigan, Idaho, West Virginia, Nebraska, Iowa, Montana, Texas, Washington, Wyoming, Colorado, Illinois, North Dakota, Nevada, Vermont, Maine, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, Ohio, South Dakota, Indiana, Missouri, New Mexico, New Jersey, Tennessee, Arkansas, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin.

There is no question but what the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the country is in favor of this legislation. It carries out the purpose of the recent amendment to the Constitution, and I trust that it will pass without a dissenting vote.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we are all in favor of legislation along the lines of the bill now before us. It is not necessary for those of us who have been here a considerable length of time to say that we are greatly pleased that the plan of electing United States Senators by direct vote of the people has been adopted as a part of the National Constitution.

As a Member of this body, I had the pleasure of voting on quite a number of occasions for an amendment of this character, and in common with others who held that view I was delighted when the constitutional amendment was adopted, and it seems very important that we should have legislation to meet the situation in States that have not legislated since the passage of the constitutional amendment.

It does seem to me, however, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation is not in the happiest form. I do not know but that it is presumptuous to say it, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] assured us that the Senate had given it very careful consideration and that his committee had given it very careful consideration. However, I desire to call attention to the fact—and I do this because the gentleman from Missouri has some time remaining and can perhaps remove my doubts in regard to the legislation—that the constitutional amendment provides "when vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies," and so forth. All that is necessary for Congress to do in the absence of State legislation is to provide some method whereby the election contemplated by the Constitution may be had.

That provision is made in section 2 of this bill; and section 2 of the bill, it seems to me, does all that it is necessary to do. It provides that "in any State wherein a United States Senator is hereafter to be elected, either at a general election or at a special election called by the executive authority thereof to fill that vacancy, until or unless otherwise specially provided by the legislature thereof the nomination of candidates for such office," and so forth.

The bill itself is presumed to be temporary in character, and yet section 1 of the bill is clearly in the form of permanent law. The chairman has suggested that he proposes to offer an amendment which will make that clearly temporary. Even so, I do not understand the necessity for the first section, and it seems to me that complications may arise under it. The constitutional amendment clearly contemplated that Senators might be elected either at general or special elections, and so provides. This first section provides for elections only at certain general elections.

Not being a lawyer, I do not hazard a guess as to whether this provision providing for the election of Senators only at general elections would preclude the election of a Senator at a special election, as contemplated by the constitutional amendment, in the absence of any action by the legislature; but at least there is a question there, and a question that ought, it seems to me, to be clarified. Then this is also true: Under the first section a vacancy occurring in the senatorial delegation of a State after a congressional election could not be filled until the next congressional election. Furthermore, do not sections 1 and 2 conflict, in that one relates to general elections only and the other to general and special elections? Assuming that this provision in section 1 for the election of a Senator at a regular election precludes the election of a Senator at a special election, are not the two sections in conflict?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I trust that this bill will be passed by the House this afternoon and that it will, without further unnecessary delay, be enacted into law within a few days. The State which I have the honor in part to represent is very greatly interested in the enactment of the legislation proposed by this bill. A primary election for county, State, and congressional offices is to be held in my State on the 24th day of June. At the general election to be held in November a United States Senator is to be elected. A number of candidates have already announced themselves for this office. The 25th of this month is, under the laws of my State, the last day for the filing of nomination petitions by candidates for State and congressional offices. The amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people was adopted and became a part of the Constitution after the adjournment of our last legislative assembly. The beginning of the next regular session of our legislative assembly does not occur until January, 1915. There is serious question as to whether under the present laws of my State any definite procedure is prescribed for the nomination and election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. Considerable discussion has taken place in the State relative to the necessity of calling a special session of our legislative assembly to enact a special statute for the nomination and election of United States Senators in the manner now required by the Constitution of the United States. The calling of this special session would, of course, involve a large expense to the people of my State. Naturally, the people of my State desire that this bill be enacted into law at an early date. They have been for several months awaiting anxiously in the hope that this bill might become a law before the 25th of this month and by its terms remove all doubt as to the proper procedure to be followed for the election of a United States Senator this year.

In this connection it might be well to call the attention of the House to the fact that the two Senators in this Congress now representing my State have as a matter of fact been elected to their present positions by the direct vote of the people. As provided for in our primary and general-election laws, they were first duly nominated at a primary election. Then at the general election following they were voted for with other candidates, and receiving the highest number of votes cast were recommended to our legislative assembly for election. The legislative assembly formally carried out the wishes of the people as expressed at the general election. So practically we have had in North Dakota for several years the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. Even this somewhat complicated method of electing United States Senators by a vote of the people has proven highly satisfactory to the people of my State. The sentiment of all parties and all the people in my State is unanimously in favor of the amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for election of Senators by direct vote of the people.

It may be interesting to some gentlemen on that side to know that there was enacted in North Dakota four years ago a preferential primary election law to apply to candidates for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States. I had the honor of assisting in drafting the law as it is now in our statutes. Under this law at the primaries held in the spring of 1912 the people of my State indicated by their votes their preference as to the candidates they wished to have as the nominees of the different political parties for the offices of President and Vice President. I trust that a similar primary-election law may soon be enacted by this Congress for all the States of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the presentation of this bill and the knowledge that it is to become a law without opposition are calculated to awaken interesting memories in the minds of those of us who recall the many times the House of Representatives voted for a constitutional amendment to provide for the election of United States Senators by the people, only to have that amendment defeated in the Senate. This we did session after session, as the gentleman from Illinois has said, but always in vain.

However, I did not intend to say anything on the pending bill, and should not now do so were it not for the remarks made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], in which he alluded to the fact that in the national convention of 1908, at Chicago, I introduced a plank for the election of Senators by the people, which was overwhelmingly defeated. It may be well enough, in this connection, to remember, also, that in the same convention I introduced a plank for the physical valuation of railroads, and that it also was defeated and by an even greater vote. I refer to these things now only to show the astonishing rapidity with which public opinion in the United States does change. The law for the physical valuation of railroads has been on the statute books for three or four years. It went through this House by a practically unanimous vote. And yet when I presented that plank in that convention it was greeted with jeers and cries of "Socialist" and "Take it to Denver." So was the plank for the election of Senators by the people. Verily, the world does move!

Mr. Speaker, everybody who has read the history of the convention which drafted the Constitution of the United States knows that the provision for the election of Senators by the legislatures of the respective States was the result of the profound distrust which many of the members of the convention entertained of the capacity of the people for self-government. But more and more the world has grown to realize that the safest and really the most conservative government is government by the people, where the people enjoy the blessings of a generally diffused education and an enlightened public opinion, as is the case in this Republic. And public opinion, the greatest force in the world, rarely, if ever, has done a more beneficent work for the United States than when it compelled Congress to pass the constitutional amendment providing for the election of Senators by the people. It has added greatly to the people's responsibilities, but it has also added immeasurably to the strength of the Republic. I congratulate the House and the country on the legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL] one minute.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this question, and only do so now in view of the remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. My memory goes back to the time when, in 1907, as a member of the upper branch of the State Legislature in Massachusetts, for the first time in the history of that State, a committee reported favorably on a proposition for an amendment to the Constitution, providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. I had been a member of that senate for four years, and up to that time we had been unable frequently to get votes enough for the proposition to demand a roll call in either branch of the legislature. And I, too, with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], am impressed with the tremendous progress which popular government is making in this country, and I am happy to have this opportunity of voting for this measure and in assisting to put upon the statute books this additional provision for the promotion of popular Government.

It is the culminating measure in writing into the law of the land the election of United States Senators by the people.

I rejoice that an opportunity has been afforded me of being present to vote for this measure. Some years ago, as a member of the Massachusetts Legislature, I introduced such legislation into the house, but it did not make very much progress; in fact, it was extremely difficult to obtain a roll call upon this measure. Afterwards, as a member of the senate, I introduced such a bill, and it had the distinction of being the first measure tending to bring about a change in the election of United States Senators to be favorably reported by the committee on constitutional amendments. It was reported in the senate, but was overwhelmingly defeated. That was only a brief seven years ago.

Since that time, from one end of the Union to the other, popular sentiment has developed to such an extent that now we find this beneficial measure the law of the land. It shows the tremendous growth in recent years of popular government and speaks well for the future of our country. We have seen with this corresponding increase in the active participation by all of the citizens in the selection of their candidates a growing and ever-widening interest in public affairs, and with this growth and development of the public, brought about by measures of this character, we have seen the diminution of the influence of special interests in legislation.

When we stop to contemplate the wonderful development and growth of popular government in recent years, can we not feel encouraged to believe that it will continue, and that in the years to come contemplated laws that are now scoffed at and sneered at, looking to the protection of the health and the lives, the happiness of the great mass of our people, will be overwhelmingly adopted?

I am for this measure heart and soul, because I have always believed that the popular election of United States Senators was the great gateway through which all reform legislation would eventually pass. The Senate has been the reactionary body. Much of the good legislation which in former years so frequently passed the House always fell in the Senate. Senators will now have to go upon the hustings and defend their course in legislation and their actions and their votes upon measures that come before them, and they will be mighty careful to make that action accord with the sane, reasonable, progressive ideas of the people. In the past they have been responsible to no one. The legislature that elected them was dissolved many times—in our State at least—before their term expired. Now they will be real servants of the people, and I believe that their ears will be attuned to catch the popular impulses and that they will respond more quickly, more effectively, and, I trust, more beneficially than ever before.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, just briefly replying to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], let me call his attention to the fact that the language he read from the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution refers to the filling of a vacancy, which, of course, can not be done until after a vacancy has ocurred. Then the executive authority of a State may do the things authorized. The first section of the bill, while in my opinion it is not absolutely necessary, is a wise provision to retain, for the reason that this language determines when the first election under this amendment shall take place. Mark you, the first section relates to something that occurs before a vacancy can occur, the election being in November in most of the States for the term beginning in March after that. I think the language is necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. RUCKER. Make it very brief, because my time is short.

Mr. MONDELL. In case a vacancy should occur immediately after the congressional election this fall and before the State legislature has acted, would there be any way under this legislation whereby that vacancy could be filled for two years?

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, I think so; beyond a question. You can have your legislature meet——

Mr. MONDELL. By convening the legislature, yes; but without convening the legislature?

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say to the gentleman that I am not trying to perfect this so as to meet every possible contingency. I am content to rest with confidence on the action of the Senate. I believe they have prepared a bill which will cover all reasonable conditions and emergencies.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that there has been some question raised with reference to two nominations of Members of the House for Senator, one from Alabama——

Mr. RUCKER. I anticipate the gentleman's question, and if he will permit me, I will say that I announced a while ago, probably during the gentleman's temporary absence from the floor, and I say "temporary" because he is always here, many times when I wish he was not [laughter]—that I had it in mind to offer an amendment to line 4, page 2, after the word "office," so as to read "the nomination for such office not heretofore made," shall be made, and so forth, referring to the time when nominations shall be made for the regular election. I think that would meet the point.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will yield, yes; but I want to say that my time is now very short.

Mr. COOPER. Is it not within the power of the committee to give the gentleman more time?

Mr. MANN. You can get more time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, to the membership of the House that I believe this is the final act, so far as Congress is concerned, in the consummation of the greatest reform that has been accomplished in this country since the Civil War. I do not believe there has been any great measure enacted into law which has given more universal satisfaction, which has ignored party lines and divisions, and received more general approval than has this measure. The gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished minority leader, becoming reminiscent awhile ago, spoke of occurrences in the House some time ago, and in the course of his remarks paid me a tribute much more complimentary than any action of mine fairly construed warrants. I appreciate the nice things the gentleman said, and thank him for saying them. I want to say that I fully concur in most the gentleman said in relation to the history of the constitutional amendment providing for the popular election of Senators. It is true that at one time I resisted for months the action of the Senate in forcing upon us the amendment in its present form. I believed then, and believe now, that the election of Senators ought to be controlled by the people of the States to be represented. I did at one time hope the Senate would recede, but the gentleman quoted me correctly when he said that failing to secure the recession of the Senate, I accepted the Senate attitude because my purpose always was, if possible, to secure this reform along lines which met with my approval and best judgment, if possible, and if not, then along any line that would give the people of this country a chance to vote directly for Senators from their States. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did quite as much as any Member to secure the submission and adoption of the resolution proposing the seventeenth amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in any State wherein a United States Senator is hereafter to be elected either at a general election or at any special election called by the executive authority thereof to fill a vacancy, until or unless otherwise specially provided by the legislature thereof, the nomination of candidates for such office shall be made, the election to fill the same conducted, and the result thereof determined as near as may be in accordance with the laws of such State regulating the nomination of candidates for and election of Members at Large of the National House of Representatives: Provided, That in case no provision is made in any State for the case of the nomination or election of Representatives at Large, the procedure shall be in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State: And provided further, That in any case the candidate for Senator receiving the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 10, page 2, by striking out the words "the case of."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized on the amendment. A parliamentary inquiry. Under the rule, how much time am I entitled to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To one hour.

Mr. MANN. It is needless to say, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not take that much time, but I suggest to my friend from Missouri that the next time he prepares a rule to hasten debate in the House, where he fixes the length of time for general debate, he should also fix the time for debate under amendment. I shall not consume the time, but in this case the gentleman could not move the previous question very well while I have the floor. I could use an hour very easily discussing this question.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. I will say to the gentleman that the resolution was expressly framed in this way, so as not to limit debate or limit amendment, but to throw it wide open in hope that the gentleman from Kansas would not deliver a lecture on gag rule.

Mr. MANN. I was not speaking about limiting debate on the amendment, but the gentleman's rule did limit general debate to one hour. But under the rule here is an amendment which involves the entire question, and I have an hour if I want to use it. I shall not use the time. There are two amendments here upon which we might easily take the rest of the afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, page 2, by striking out the words "in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the same as that provided for the nomination and election of governor of such State."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the question I attempted to ask at the outset of general debate. The gentleman will observe that in the bill as it came from the Senate the proviso beginning on line 9, page 2, read as follows:

Provided, That in case no provision is made in any State for the case of the nomination or election of Representatives at Large, the procedure shall be in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State.

Then followed the proviso beginning on line 16:

Provided, That in any case the candidate for Senator receiving the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected.

That, of course, meant the highest number of the votes of the entire State. But in the bill as reported by the House committee, and now before us, the words—in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State—have been stricken out, and in lieu thereof the words—

the same as that provided for the governor of a State—have been inserted, thus making an entirely different requirement, because under certain circumstances in the State of Vermont the governor is not elected by vote of the people of the entire State. If no candidate for governor at the general election in the State of Vermont has a clear majority of the entire vote of the State, then the election of a governor is thrown into the legislature, and the legislature may elect a governor without regard to the vote of the people of the entire State.

The last proviso of the Senate bill, especially the words in line 17—

The candidate for Senator receiving the highest number of votes—

related to the election by the people of the entire State—that is, to the highest number of the votes cast in the entire State—but if the election of Senator in the State of Vermont should be thrown into the legislature does not the gentleman from Missouri think there is ambiguity or contradiction in the language of the bill as amended?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am frank to say to the gentleman that he has suggested some things that were not discussed by the committee and that possibly might have some danger in them, but I will say to him that this measure, with the discussion that has taken place here, will go to the Senate, and if there is danger in those lines he can rest assured that it will be settled so there will be no trouble about it. The amendment the committee made was made at the suggestion of one member of the committee by reason of conditions existing in the State in which the member lives. We thought the language was better than the language prepared in the original bill.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman sees, of course, that line 14, when connected up with the proviso as it originally read, provides that the Senators shall be elected by a vote of the entire State, and that a plurality shall elect.

Mr. RUCKER. Of course the gentleman well understands that this is an act relating solely to the election of Senators, and that under the universal rule, recognized everywhere, the entire act would be construed together, and the first section makes it clear and plain that the election with which we are dealing is the election of United States Senators by the people of the State. I think there is no trouble about that at all. If I thought there was any danger along these lines, I would be glad to change the language of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a suggestion for the consideration of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], on the point on which he was just speaking. It seems to me that the last proviso might be taken up in this way as applying particularly to the exigency which might arise in Vermont. If it be found that no candidate has a majority for election, then the proviso supplies a way out of the difficulty by stating that in any event the candidate for Senator who receives the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected; in other words, making the proviso apply to a case of that kind as well as to the matter of the number of votes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The question is on agreeing to the second committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "office," insert the words "not theretofore made."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. Is the gentleman sure that the word "theretofore" is the proper word to use in that amendment?

Mr. RUCKER. I was not quite sure whether the word should be "theretofore" or "heretofore."

Mr. WILLIS. If he uses the word "theretofore," the gentleman will see that will take it back to the general time referred to in the preceding language. As I understand the gentleman, what he wants to cure is the possible defect that would be applicable to certain Members of the House who have already been nominated for Senator.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, recognizing the gentleman's ability, I will gladly accept his suggestion.

Mr. WILLIS. It seems to me that the word ought to be "heretofore."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by changing the word "theretofore" to "heretofore."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say this, that the word does not have reference to the date of the passage of the bill, but has reference to the date of the election under the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I think it is clearer to make it read "heretofore."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is clear either way, myself. I went over this bill, examining that question as best I could, and personally I do not believe that the bill would affect at all the nominations made in Alabama and South Dakota. I believe those are the only two places where nominations have been made or are likely to be made before the bill becomes a law. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] that if this amendment be inserted in the bill, with these other amendments which have been agreed to, the bill ought to be considered in conference, if he has suggestions to make to the Senate, instead of having the Senate agree to these various amendments, so that these things can be very carefully considered. When this legislation is enacted, it ought not to give rise to a lot more controversies which the constitutional amendment has given rise to already.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I have conferred with the author of the bill and some other gentlemen on both sides of the Senate Chamber who are very much interested in the speedy passage of the bill, and I am quite certain Senators will welcome prompt action by the House, and if there is anything in it that needs changing, it will be done before final action in the Senate, perhaps in conference. I think that that is the expectation.

Mr. MANN. I suggested conference. Whether it is done in conference or by the Senate, I do not care, so long as these things are carefully considered.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I attempted a moment ago to receive recognition in reference to the amendment already passed, basing this election on the method of electing a governor, which is absolutely right. The committee has shown good judgment in cutting out the provision for the election in the same manner as other administrative officers are elected, because there are all kinds of differences in State statutes as to how various administrative officers of the State shall be elected, but when we say that Senators shall be nominated and elected in the way the governor is elected we have something definite. Second-choice provisions apply as to some offices and do not apply as to others.

I introduced the first bill upon this subject, and based it upon that theory, and I take some pride in seeing, while my bill was not accepted on the other side, that the committee did put my view of that particular feature into the bill. The bill would be much better now if all reference to the manner of electing Congressmen at Large were eliminated and the whole procedure were based on the manner of electing a governor as in my bill, introduced over a year ago—April 21, 1913—provided. In our own State we had considerable difficulty determining whether the second-choice provisions of our primary law referred to Congressmen at Large, but there is no indefiniteness as to the manner of electing and nominating a governor.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that I am not more timid than other men, but if we want to pass this bill we had better get at it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was merely going to call the gentleman's attention to the word "near" at the end of line 5 on page 2. The gentleman from Missouri is an eminent grammarian, a man of high authority on the use of language, and I would inquire of him whether he thinks the word "near" ought to be employed there or the word "nearly"—simply in the interest of good form?

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Michigan has complimented the gentleman from Missouri and criticized some Senator of the United States. I did not write the language.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am glad to compliment the gentleman from Missouri and am perfectly willing to criticize the Senator.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting a new section at the end of the bill, to be numbered section 3 and to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That this act shall expire by limitation at the end of three years from the date of its approval."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUCKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I would also ask unanimous consent for leave to print an address made by Mr. Elwood Mead, at Denver, Colo., on April 9, on farm loans and credit extensions and reclamation practices in Australia. This is a matter of much interest to the people of my State and the country generally.

The SPEAKER. Who made the speech?

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Elwood Mead. This gentleman was invited to make this address by Secretary Lane, of the Interior Department, and——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by Mr. Mead at Denver, Colo., on the subject of irrigation and reclamation. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not understand it was on the subject——

Mr. FALCONER. It was on reclamation projects in Australia.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said farm credits.

Mr. FALCONER. It also treats of methods of loans for farm improvements.

Mr. MANN. There is a committee that is having hearings on this subject and innumerable documents on the subject. Are we going to print all in the RECORD?

Mr. FALCONER. I should not have said farm credits so much as methods of handling funds in connection with irrigation and reclamation, and in this way dealing with the farm-loan feature of the financial system of Australia.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the speech is on the subject of irrigation bonds?

Mr. FALCONER. It covers the question of bonds issued against irrigation and loans on lands in process of improvement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have had so many reclamation-project bonds sold by bond houses of the United States where failures have been made by the concerns that have issued the bonds, and so many of our people have been fooled by that sort of investment and have lost every dollar they put into them that it is a serious question whether we ought to take the dictum of somebody as to what is being done in Australia, and it seems to me that the irrigation-bond proposition in this country has been so overdone that there is serious danger of adding to the troubles that have already existed and now exist as to the investment of our people, and I really think it is a question whether we ought to let this be printed and sent out. However, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AMBASSADORS TO ARGENTINA AND CHILE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report (No. 667) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom were referred the resolutions (H. Res. 507 and H. Res. 508) providing, respectively, for the consideration of H. R. 15503 and H. R. 13667, having considered the same, beg to report in lieu thereof the following substitute and recommend that it be adopted:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 4553 and H. R. 15503; that the first reading of the bills be dispensed with, and that there shall be one hour's general debate on both bills, to be divided equally between those favoring and those opposing the measures. At the expiration of said one hour's general debate the bills shall be considered in the order named under the five-minute rule, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall perfect and report the measures to the House, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bills and all amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the bills which this rule seeks to make in order are Senate bill 4553 and House bill 15503, respectively. The bill S. 4553 is to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina, and H. R. 15503 is a bill authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile. These bills have been unanimously reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. They have the approval of those who are directly responsible for the conduct of our foreign affairs—not only the approval, but a request, supported by those in the best position to know what the foreign relations of our country are—and therefore it seemed to the Committee on Rules that it was very proper to bring these matters in, and hence it has made this report.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MANN. I did not catch the reading of the rule entirely. How much time is allowed for general debate?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. An hour for general debate on both bills.

Mr. MANN. On each bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On both bills; one hour to the two bills.

Mr. MANN. How can you have general debate at the same time upon two bills? You can not consider them at the same time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It can be done by unanimous consent. Anyone who should get the floor, of course, would have half an hour. Half of the time is controlled by gentlemen in favor of the bill, and one-half of the time is controlled by anyone opposed to the bills, and during that time the person having the floor can talk on either one or both of the bills or can yield to any person to speak on any one or both.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the Committee on Rules can do almost anything in the way of a rule, if it is backed up by the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It can not do anything unless it is backed up.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but the novelty to me is to provide for general debate on a number of bills at the same time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This provides for the control of the time; that the time shall be controlled——

Mr. MANN. You can not have both bills up for consideration at the same time. Each bill must have a first reading.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The rule dispenses with the first reading.

Mr. MANN. Well, the bill has to be reported to the committee or to the House, in any event. I suppose next we shall have a rule to have general debate one day and then no further general debate during the entire session of Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would not the gentleman approve of something of that sort?

Mr. MANN. Well, so far as concerns the debate that comes from that side of the House I would. I think we could profitably dispense with most of that. But you gain light when it comes to general debate from this side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois mean light debate? [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I simply suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that general debate for one hour precedes the consideration of these two bills in their order, at which time they shall be taken up and considered under the five-minute rule for amendment and debate. I think the rule specifically provides the method by which this is to be done, and that there is no great difficulty about it. One hour is allowed for general debate, and then the bills shall be taken up in the order named in the rule for amendment and debate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman think that the House can consider two bills at the same time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. If it agrees to the rule, it can.

Mr. MANN. It will be considering them; but can it, as a matter of fact? You can not pass two bills at the same roll call.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The two bills are to be debated. The general debate is one thing. The consideration of the bills is another thing. There is to be one hour of general debate, in which you can discuss Argentina or Chile or the general dilapidated condition of the Democratic Party. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. There would not be enough time for that. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The bills are under consideration. That is what the rule provides. And it is proposed to have two measures, entirely distinct, under consideration at the same time. You might as well try to put one man in two places at the same time.

Mr. OGLESBY. You mean you can not have two men in one place. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. The bill can be taken up for amendment,

Mr. MANN. The bill is under consideration just as much during the general debate, theoretically, as it is at any other time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman concluded?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not care to use any time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think we might as well put this to a practical test, to see whether we can debate two bills at the same time; and I therefore move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 27.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Is this in the House as in Committee of the Whole? I think the House automatically goes into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] will take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 4553) to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina and of the bill (H. R. 15503) authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile, with Mr. MOON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 4553 and House bill 15503. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the growing importance, politically and commercially, of the two Republics of Argentina and Chile has led their Governments to suggest to our State Department the propriety of accrediting diplomatic representatives of the highest character to those countries. Our executive department is most favorably inclined to this suggestion. Recognizing the greatness of these two South American countries, their commercial importance, and the great part they will play in the world's politics in the years to come, the President and the State Department are desirous that we accredit to these two Republics ambassadors instead of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary.

It is needless for me to go into a very lengthy discussion of the commercial and political importance of these two countries. I will therefore give my reasons for advocating this bill as briefly as possible.

ARGENTINA.

The United States is just entering upon a great Pan American era and it can not afford to neglect any worthy opportunity and responsibility which will make and keep it a leader in the progress of the American Republics. It is no exaggeration, speaking from the Latin-American, as well as the United States standpoint, to state that the United States may now be facing a critical period in the future of the western continent. What it does now and during the next few years in its Pan American policy will determine whether its sister Republics of the south are to follow it and cooperate with it for the good of all American nations, or are to follow Europe and cooperate with her in the development of international commerce and comity and of that international interdependence which has such vast significance.

The majority of the people and of the newspapers of the United States have been so occupied with home affairs or with foreign questions involving Europe and Asia and the near-by States of Latin America that they have not had time to study and appreciate the wonderful material development and political progress of Argentina and Chile in southern South America. If they knew the situation as they know that of the States of the United States, they would wonder why we had not already voted that the legations in Buenos Aires, the capital of Argentina, and Santiago, the capital of Chile, should be raised to the rank of embassies. The small additional cost to the United States Government of a few thousand dollars is a mere bagatelle compared to the value of the commerce, the prestige, and the influence involved. Take the consensus of opinion of a thousand Americans who have visited Argentina and Chile during the past three years and they will almost unanimously declare that this step should now be voted in unanimous acclamation by the United States Congress. These are not terms of exaggeration or enthusiasm. They are simple facts which are absolutely true and which can not be disputed except by those who are unfamiliar with the situation.

Some years ago the United States raised its legation in Brazil to an embassy, and every student of international relations will tell you that it was a wise, deserved, and well-rewarded action. Now let the United States take similar action in Argentina and Chile, the other two great countries of the so-called "A B C" relationship. If the United States delays such action, the honors of this distinction will go to Spain, and may soon be followed by France and possibly Great Britain and Germany. Spain has already acted in Argentina, and it is indeed significant that Germany has recently sent Prince Henry on a special mission of courtesy and recognition to both Argentina and Chile, which may be a preparatory step to following the example of Spain.

Possibly a bird's-eye view of some of the remarkable features of Argentina and Chile may help Members of Congress to appreciate the importance of these Republics.

Looking first at Argentina, we note that it is located almost entirely in the South Temperate Zone. It has a greater reach from north to south—2,700 miles—than has the connected area of the United States. It has an area of 1,135,000 square miles, which is equal to that section of the United States east of the Mississippi River and part of the first tier of States west of it. It has a greater proportion of productive agricultural area than has the corresponding area of the United States. It has a population exceeding 9,000,000, according to latest estimates, and could support in prosperity 70,000,000. It conducts a foreign commerce valued at the immense total of $900,000,000, which gives it the largest per capita trade of any important nation in the world. It conducts, with this population of 9,000,000, a greater foreign trade than mighty Japan, which has a population of 50,000,000, or of great China, which has 300,000,000. It bought last year from the United States products valued at $60,000,000, and it sold to the United States products valued at $22,000,000, or a total exchange of products valued at $82,000,000. This represents a greater increase in the last decade than the trade of any European country with Argentina, and yet the United States has only begun to open up its trade possibilities in that land.

Buenos Aires, the capital of Argentina, is the fourth city of the Western Hemisphere, ranking after New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia. It is the second Latin city in the world, ranking next to Paris. It is the largest city of the world south of the Equator. It has to-day a population of 1,500,000, which represents an increase of 600,000 in the last 10 years. As evidence of Buenos Aires' greatness as a world capital, it should be realized that it has spent $50,000,000 in providing itself with an unsurpassed system of concrete docks and wharves and with two channels, each 30 miles long and 30 feet deep, to deep water in the River Plate. It has just expended $25,000,000 on a great subway system of transportation. It has recently completed a capitol building, second only to our own among the capitols of the world. It possesses the finest newspaper building and plant in the world; it possesses the finest opera house in the world, except possibly those of Paris and Vienna, and, finally, it possesses the finest array of public-school buildings of any city in the world.

Argentina is gridironed with a system of railroads that reach from Patagonia 2,000 miles to Paraguay, and is constructing now many thousands of additional miles. It is now shipping abroad vast quantities of wheat and beef. It has two transcontinental systems of railways connecting its Atlantic seaboard with the Pacific seaboard of Chile and successfully crossing the Andes en route. It is building great irrigation systems in the arid sections, it is harnessing the water powers of the Andes, and it is making navigable the channels of the Parana and Uruguay Rivers far into the interior.

Looking, in conclusion, at the sentimental side of the question, it should be remembered that the great liberator of Argentina, San Martin, fought successfully for the independence of his country under the inspiration of George Washington; that the constitution of Argentina in many respects is written upon the Constitution of the United States; that Sarmiento, its great President of later years, who founded and built up Argentina's educational system upon knowledge he acquired in the United States, was always a true friend of the United States; and that to-day Minister Naon, who ably represents Argentina in the United States, is a great student of the institutions of the United States, and ranks not only as one of the leading statesmen but foremost educators of his country, will make a most worthy and distinguished ambassador in the foreign diplomatic colony of Washington.

And so I might go on giving reasons upon reasons why the United States Legation in Buenos Aires should be raised to an embassy, but I will conclude with only one more observation regarding that country. The Argentine Congress is this week just beginning its annual regular session. It is a distinguished and representative body, like the Congress of the United States. The newspapers of Argentina have been discussing the movement of the United States to raise the rank of its legation in Buenos Aires to an embassy, and these Congressmen can not fail to note that up to now, many months after the introduction of the bill in the United States, it has not been passed. They are also well aware that the King of Spain has just signed a decree raising the Spanish Legation to an embassy. If the United States Congress should now fail to pass unanimously this important bill, such action might naturally inspire unfavorable and unfortunate comment among the sensitive, high-strung, forceful, and ambitious peoples and Congressmen of this sister Republic. On the other hand, now that the question is brought for the first time to a determining vote, immediate and favorable action will produce a profoundly favorable impression on the Argentine people and Congress, which can not fail to have a permanent and good effect upon the relations of the United States and Argentina. [Applause.]

CHILE.

Now, let us consider Chile. While much that I have said about Argentina will apply equally well to Chile and need not, therefore, be repeated, there is much which is striking and impressive regarding the latter country that should be borne carefully in mind. In view of the fact that the Panama Canal is about to be opened to commerce and that the attention and hopes of the American people are centered in that waterway, Chile has a unique and extraordinary importance in the foreign, political, and commercial relations of the United States. Although it may not have as extensive population, area, and foreign trade as Argentina and Brazil, it has a strategical, commercial, and political position of great significance and power which must not be forgotten or underestimated. Chile holds in South America a place of peculiar strength which gives it a remarkable influence in the diplomatic councils of that continent, and especially in the so-called A B C relationship. Following the completion of the Panama Canal and having in mind the great fifth Pan American conference, which is to meet at Santiago, the capital of Chile, in November of this year, it would seem unfortunate not to raise the United States Legation at Santiago to the rank of an embassy. What Chile may lack in actual area, population, and foreign commerce, it more than makes up in international influence, in stability and quality of government, in vigor of race, in pride of achievement, and in exceptional geographical position. And yet, though Chile may not equal Brazil and Argentina in square miles, number of inhabitants, and in value of foreign trade, it is still remarkable in these respects and worthy of special consideration and study. Chile has an area of nearly 300,000 square miles, which is nearly equal to that of Spain and France combined. It has a population of about 4,000,000, but these are 4,000,000 of energetic, high-class people. It conducted last year a foreign trade valued, approximately, at $400,000,000, which is almost as great as the foreign trade of China and which may soon equal that of Japan. Its per capita trade is nearly $100, or twice that of the United States, ten times more than that of Japan, and twenty times that of China. Although the United States has only just begun, as it were, to build up its exchange of products with Chile, the total value of this exchange last year was over $40,000,000 with prospects of enormous increase after the opening of the Panama Canal.

But the most impressive fact about Chile, viewed strategically, politically, and geographically, is its unique relationship to the Panama Canal. Almost directly south from Washington through the canal it has a coast line on the Pacific Ocean in the South Temperate Zone of nearly 3,000 miles, and varies in width from 50 to 200 miles, with an extraordinary variety of climate, products, and resources. If the southern end of Chile were placed at the Mexican-California line on the west coast of the United States, the northern end would reach beyond the line of California and Oregon, of Oregon and Washington, of Washington and British Columbia, of British Columbia and Alaska, way up into the heart of Alaska.

Santiago, its famous capital, has a population of 500,000, and is often called the "Paris of the Andes." Valparaiso, Chile's chief port, has a rapidly growing population of 250,000, and the Chilean Government is expending $15,000,000 in making the harbor of Valparaiso ready for the Panama Canal and the best artificial port on the entire coast line of the Pacific Ocean. Chile is already well provided with railways, running from different coast points into the interior, and is now completing a longitudinal line with numerous branches.

To make the Panama Canal of the greatest possible usefulness, strategic and commercial, to the United States, no legitimate steps should be neglected which would promote and cement good understanding between Chile and the United States. At this moment the wise and reasonable step for the United States to take is to raise its legation at Santiago to the rank of an embassy and give the United States the distinction of sending the first foreign ambassador to that progressive and powerful country of the southern and western portion of South America.

Correspondingly, Chile will undoubtedly reciprocate and honor the United States by raising its legation in Washington to an embassy, and if the present able minister, Mr. Eduardo Suárez, is promoted, a man of notable statesmanship and achievement in the public affairs of Chile will be that Republic's first ambassador to the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Are those countries sending ambassadors here now?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Each of them will send an ambassador here just as soon as this Congress and their Congress act upon the proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. How much difference does it make in the cost?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Between seven and eight thousand dollars a year.

Mr. MADDEN. In each case?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; in each case. We have passed a law prohibiting the President from raising the rank of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to that of an ambassador, so that an act of Congress is necessary. The same, I am informed, is true in Argentina, and as soon as we act upon this bill it is believed that the Congress of Argentina will act upon a similar bill, and an interchange of ambassadors will take place. [Applause.]

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Does the gentleman think it is a proper time now to take this action just at a time when representatives of those two countries are acting as mediators in this Mexican affair?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that both of these bills, providing for embassies in Argentina and Chile, were introduced in Congress before this mediation proposition was made. The Argentina bill had passed the Senate before that date, and both of them had been favorably reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House. I think, in view of these facts, that no possible criticism could arise by reason of our passing bills that we had already reported, and one of which had already passed one branch of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the bill S. 4553 under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further desire for general debate, the Clerk will read for amendment the bill (S. 4553) to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, as the representative of the United States, an ambassador to Argentina, who shall receive as his compensation the sum of $17,500 per annum.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will next report the bill (H. R. 15503) authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, as the representative of the United States, an ambassador to the Republic of Chile, who shall receive as his compensation the sum of $17,500 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any amendment to be offered to this bill?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, and that the committee do now rise and report these bills to the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it requires two motions to do both those things.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put first the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report these bills to the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FLOOD of Virginia) there were—ayes 31, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4553) to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina and the bill (H. R. 15503) to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that they do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill (S. 4553) to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage.

Mr. WINGO. On that I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 7.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will next report the bill (H. R. 15503) authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HENRY, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, and Mr. WINGO demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 7.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill 4377 is on the Speaker's table, and a House bill in identical terms has been reported and is on the calendar. I ask that Senate bill 4377 be laid before the House for present consideration.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 4377) to provide for the construction of four revenue cutters, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construct one steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of southern California, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $350,000; one steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the Gulf of Mexico, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $250,000; one steam revenue cutter of the second class for service on the coast of Maine, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $225,000; and one steam revenue cutter of the third class for service as anchorage patrol boat in New York Harbor, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, does this require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it a matter of privilege?

The SPEAKER. It is one of the things that the rules provide may be called up from the Speaker's table at any time.

Mr. MADDEN. Has this matter been considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; and an identical bill is on the calendar, and I have authority to call up this bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the necessity for the construction of all these revenue cutters? In what shape is the Revenue-Cutter Service now?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is very badly in need of being replenished. We have had no new authorization since 1910. Several of the cutters are almost entirely out of business, and we are compelled to have some new ones.

Mr. MADDEN. Where are the revenue cutters located at present, and how many have we?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are so expeditious in their movements, and they are running around doing so much good, that I can not state their present exact location at a moment's notice. There are about 37 of them, and I will put into the RECORD the data desired by the gentleman. About 29 of these cutters are almost worthless, through antiquity and decay.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that an important matter like this ought to be considered at a time when the House has a pretty large membership present. We are proposing to spend about a million dollars here.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will first beg the gentleman's pardon for not regarding him as one of the parliamentarians with whom I must reckon. I saw all of those who usually watch the Treasury, and worthily win their appellation of watchdogs of the Treasury, including the leader of the minority [Mr. MANN], and I confess that in order to be sure to get a vote on this bill without opposition I consented to some amendments making reductions in this program. I intend to offer those amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. How much does this bill propose to expend?

Mr. ADAMSON. A total of $925,000; and I expect to move to cut that in half by amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not wish to embarrass the gentleman from Georgia by asking unnecessary questions, but it seems to me the subject is one which it is desirable to explain. There is a revenue cutter provided for the harbor of New York, to cost $100,000. Revenue cutters are provided for other sections of the country to cost $350,000. I would like to know from the gentleman what is the necessity for a difference in the cost of the revenue cutters?

Mr. ADAMSON. The one at New York is chiefly for local use, and it is not necessary to be so large and expensive.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they not all for local use?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; some of them have to go to sea. The one in the Gulf has a tempestuous course, and so has the one on the coast of Maine. Both of these are old. I think the one on the coast of Maine is between 40 and 50 years old. It could not stand another season perhaps, and the one on the Gulf is a little bit of a thing, never intended for sea service before it grew old.

Mr. MADDEN. In view of the fact that the Democratic Members of Congress so recently passed a tariff law which does away with the necessity of revenue cutters, does not the gentleman from Georgia think it is extravagant to expend a million dollars to build revenue cutters to look after business that does not exist?

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to say to the gentleman that the revenue cutters will be kept busy all the time, even if they do not have to collect enough revenue to run the Government. They are busy saving ships and saving lives, also hunting and destroying derelicts, wrecks that endanger commerce, and patroling for icebergs in northern seas; and in time of war they are busy whipping our enemies, for in the history of the United States they have done more effective fighting than any other force. Ship for ship, the revenue cutter has been of more value than the battleship.

Mr. MADDEN. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that I interrupted the gentleman, because his information is most valuable.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, I could give gentlemen a lot more if I had to, but I did not want to give it all just now.

Mr. MADDEN. If I had not asked the question, we would not have got the information which the gentleman has seen fit to enlighten us with. I wish the gentleman from Georgia would enlighten the House on the importance of this legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is a very full report on the House bill which I would like to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the House bill is on the Union Calendar, and the Senate bill would be referred to that calendar, too, if the Chair referred it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this Senate bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if the report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce can not be read for the information of the House in connection with the consideration of this question?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would be glad to have it read. In the meantime I wish to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] for a question.

Mr. ESCH. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether or not the first revenue cutter provided for in this bill is not to take the place of the revenue cutter that was wrecked in Alaskan waters two years ago, and if it is not necessary to build a large revenue cutter on account of her having to serve in Alaskan waters and assist in matters like pelagic sealing and the supply of coal to coast points?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; it requires a large and strong ship up in those waters. The waters are stormy and the coast is long.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman permit me to say that two of the best revenue cutters in the service are employed and have been since the sinking of the Titanic during the ice season in patrolling the north Atlantic and also in the destruction of derelicts, and the fact that they are so engaged now makes the necessity much greater for having new revenue cutters.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. COVINGTON), as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3328) to provide for the construction of four revenue cutters, having considered the same, recommend that it pass.

The bill as amended has the approval of the Treasury Department, as will appear by the letter attached, and which is made a part of this report.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, July 12, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The department is in receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing copy of a bill (H. R. 3328) to provide for the construction of four revenue cutters, and asking for the views of the department concerning the bill.

In reply, I have the honor to state that the subject of new vessels for the Revenue-Cutter Service is at the present time a most vital one, inasmuch as there is the most urgent need of replacing several of the vessels comprising the fleet, with new and efficient craft for the proper performance of the severe duties with which they are charged by law.

A fleet of 37 revenue cutters is indispensable for the proper performance of the various duties placed upon this service by Congress. Up to the summer of 1910 the fleet comprised a total of 37 vessels of the several classes, but the loss of the Perry in the Bering Sea during that season reduced the number to 36, divided as follows:

First class	17
Second class	6
Third class	11
First-class seagoing tugs	2
Total	36

There are in addition seven small launches in harbors and rivers, together with one old vessel which is practically a hulk, used as a station ship at the Revenue-Cutter Service depot at Arundel Cove, Md., and these can be disregarded in considering the subject of new vessels.

The average efficient life of a revenue cutter, and in fact of all vessels of that type, is about 20 years. After that length of service the vessel and her machinery become obsolete, and she is unable to perform efficiently the duties required of her. In addition, it is found that extensive repairs are needed frequently, and the cost of these repairs amounts to such a high percentage of the value of an old vessel that it is not economical from any standpoint to continue her in service. To show the ages of the several vessels comprising the fleet of revenue cutters the following table, arranged chronologically, is submitted:

Name.	When built.	Present age.	Name.	When built.	Present age.
		Years.			Years.
Woodbury	1864	49	Onondaga	1898	15
Manhattan	1873	40	Seminole	1900	13
Bear	1874	39	Mohawk	1902	11
Hartley	1875	38	Tuscarora	1902	11
Thetis	1881	32	Arcata	1903	10
Morrill	1889	24	Mackinac	1903	10
Winona	1890	23	Winnisimmet	1903	10
Apache	1891	22	Wissahickon	1904	9
Itasca	1893	20	Pamlico	1907	6
Hudson	1893	20	Androscoggin	1908	5
Calumet	1894	19	Seneca	1908	5
Guthrie	1895	18	Davey	1908	5
Windom	1896	17	Acushnet	1908	5
Golden Gate	1896	17	Snohomish	1908	5
Gresham	1897	16	Yamacraw	1909	4
Manning	1897	16	Tahoma	1909	4
McCulloch	1898	15	Unalga	1912	1
Algonquin	1898	15	Miami	1912	1

It will thus be seen that 10 of the vessels now in the fleet have been in service for a period of 20 years or over.

With a fleet of 37 vessels, the average efficient life of each being about 20 years, there should be provided 2 new vessels annually in order to keep the fleet in efficient condition, and that the authorization of new vessels during the past 8 years has not been in keeping with the necessities is shown by the following list of vessels appropriated for since 1905:

	Vessels.
1905	1
1906	2
1908	0
1909	0
1910	2
1911	0
Total, 8 years	9

Nine new vessels in 8 years is not sufficient to properly maintain the efficiency of the fleet, and in consequence the existing fleet of 36 vessels is not in the condition it should be. The service is therefore compelled to perform such duties as it can with 1 vessel 49 years old, 4 vessels between 32 and 40, and 5 vessels 20 years old or over.

There can be no question, therefore, as to the absolute necessity for the immediate construction of the four new revenue cutters contemplated in bill H. R. 3328. An itemized statement of the necessity for each of these vessels follows:

(1) The first-class vessel called for in the bill for the waters of southern California, at a cost of $350,000, is to replace the Perry, which was lost during the summer of 1910 in a dense fog off the Pribilof Islands while engaged in the seal patrol. The present Alaskan fleet is consequently one vessel short. The Perry was built in 1884 and transferred from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast in 1894, when the need for additional vessels for service in Alaska became urgent. At best she was too small; her bunker and hold capacity entirely too limited. Vessels on duty in Alaskan waters must carry six months' stores and provisions, which necessitates ample storage room, and being obliged to cruise actively for two weeks or more at a time ample coal bunker space is needed. The Perry, 161 feet long, with a displacement of but 451 tons, carried only 90 tons of coal. Being obliged to carry most of her stores on deck and having a cruising radius of but 1,500 miles, she was ofttimes unable to meet the duties demanded of her. The vessel to replace the Perry should be of sufficient size to enable her to carry six months' stores and provisions, together with a coal supply that will give her a radius of at least 4,500 miles of economical steaming. Such a vessel can not be constructed for less than the amount named.

(2) The first-class vessel for service in the Gulf of Mexico, at a cost of $250,000, is to replace the Winona, whose headquarters are at Mobile, Ala. The Winona was built in 1890 and is at present doing duty on the Mississippi Sound. She is old and of a type entirely unfitted for the present demands upon the service. Having been built for interior waters, she has a very light draft and is unable to proceed to sea at any distance and withstand the storms of the Gulf. In 1910, when a serious storm did much damage to shipping in the Gulf and many appeals for assistance reached the department, it was necessary to send the Yamacraw from the Atlantic coast to the Gulf for this purpose, thereby losing much time when quick work was needed. The new vessel asked for to replace the Winona will provide a suitable vessel for the Gulf and the service be enabled to promptly and efficiently meet the demands upon it.

(3) The second-class vessel, at a cost of $225,000, is to replace the Woodbury on the coast of Maine. This is the oldest craft now in use by any branch of the Government and is the only vessel extant which saw service both in the Civil War and the Spanish War. She is now 49 years old; her hull is rotten, her boiler leaky, and the whole ship of an obsolete type.

(4) The $100,000 vessel of the third class, for service as anchorage patrol boat in New York Harbor, is to replace the Manhattan. This vessel is 40 years old; her iron hull is about rusted out; her boiler and machinery are obsolete in type and nearly worn out. It is with great difficulty that this craft is kept patched up for service, which, at the best, she performs very inefficiently.

With the authorization of these four vessels so urgently needed at the present time, two new vessels annually in the future will suffice to maintain the present revenue-cutter fleet.

The total cost of these four new vessels will amount to $925,000, and in this connection the following tabular statement of the regular operations of the Revenue-Cutter Service since 1907 is submitted for the purpose of showing the value of these operations to the maritime interests of the country, particularly in the matter of lives and money saved, and as indicating that from a business standpoint it is a good investment to provide the new vessels so urgently needed in order to maintain the revenue-cutter fleet on an efficient basis to continue this work required by law:

Lives and property saved by the operations of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

Fiscal year.	Lives saved from drowning (actually rescued).	Fines and penalties incurred by vessels reported.	Value of vessels assisted and their cargoes.	Derelicts and obstructions to navigation removed or destroyed.
1907	41	$53,732	$9,196,097	17
1908	50	54,700	6,858,918	18
1909	56	39,175	13,940,709	25
1910	25	160,569	10,247,535	24
1911	55	185,701	9,488,562	21

Total for 6 years	333	718,087	60,277,394	150
Average for 6 years	55	119,681	10,046,232	25

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the reference in that report two or three times to two ships a year was intended to be begun by building four revenue cutters, and after that two a year. The leaders of the House fell upon the two ships a year and left off the four ships to begin with, and compelled me to make the motion to have two every year without the prefatory four ships catching up to begin with. I promised on my part if they kept the promise on their part of the agreement, and if I continue as chairman of the commtitee I expect to demand the other two next winter.

Mr. MADDEN. Who was this contract made with?

Mr. ADAMSON. Many leaders of the House. I am sorry that I can not give the gentleman their names and I am sorry the gentleman was not consulted as one of them.

Mr. MADDEN. There may be some Members who do not consider themselves as leaders, or of so much importance in the House, who may want to say something about it.

Mr. ADAMSON. If anyone can outlead as leader, I hope he will outlead as leader, but my conversation was with those gentlemen who by their positions are entitled to participate in directing the affairs of the House. I am compelled to acknowledge them here as leaders, but I will gladly acknowledge the leadership of any other gentleman who either shows it or claims it.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it was wise to enter into a contract of that kind and demand that the House should carry that contract out.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not demand it of the House; I say I am going to keep my part of the contract or agreement.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is not only unwise for three or four men, or a combination, to make a contract or agreement of that kind, I think it is an assumption on the part of any number of men less than a majority.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think the gentleman is bound by any understanding, nor did I make any contract or combination, but whenever I found anybody who objected to it I asked him what his objection was and then I tried to remove or avoid it, and a great many of the able leaders of the House asked me to offer amendments, and I am going to do so in good faith, and one is to strike out, in lines 4, 5, and 6, the language—

One steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of southern California, at a cost not exceeding the sum of $350,000.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in lines 4, 5, and 6, page 1, the following: "One steam revenue cutter of the first class for service in the waters of southern California, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $350,000."

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. Is it not highly important that we should have more revenue cutters on the Pacific coast?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think we ought to have six. If I live until next winter, I will see that you have this one and one in the North Pacific, too.

Mr. LEVY. There is nothing more deserving than the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is right about that. The two I propose to leave in the bill are to replace cutters entirely out of commission from dilapidation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I was called from the Chamber to the telephone just as the gentleman started to state what the agreement was.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I was notified by numerous of the great leaders of the House that I could not get through this bill for four revenue cutters, but I could get it through for two, and take the other two for next year, and then two annually thereafter. I then referred the matter to the Treasury Department, and the department indicated the two that they were most compelled to have at this time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know the gentleman did not yield except under coercion.

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not, and I tell the gentleman now that I wish they had three or four on the Pacific coast, and if I live until next winter he shall have this one if I can help him secure it.

Mr. BELL of California. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman to say that the department advised the cutting out of these vessels?

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, no. The department told me the two it most needed at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington and Mr. BELL of California) there were—ayes 27, noes 13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I now move to insert the word "and," in line 8, just before the word "one."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 8, by inserting before the word "one" the word "and."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, how will that make the language of the bill read?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold that until I make another motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out lines 11, 12, and 13.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 11, 12, and 13, being the following language: "And one steam revenue cutter of the third class for service as anchorage patrol boat in New York Harbor, at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000."

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CONRY. What is the necessity for this?

Mr. ADAMSON. The necessity to get the bill through, in order to secure anything at all. I have been advised I could not get any if I did not strike out two, and I asked the Treasury Department to advise me which two were most needed, and they advised me they had to have the one on the Gulf and the one on the Maine coast. I will say to the gentleman that he will get his next winter.

Mr. CONRY. I am not seeking any personally at all. I simply wanted to make this inquiry. Originally there must have been some necessity for the insertion of this provision for the anchorage patrol boat in New York Harbor.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CONRY. Will the gentleman please set forth that necessity?

Mr. ADAMSON. I took it from the department, and it is set out in the report which has just been read; but I also take it that the necessity is not as great as it is for the cutters at the Gulf and on the Maine coast, and when we have to eliminate two we eliminate those which are needed the least at the present time.

Mr. CONRY. Does that necessity still exist?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it does. I do not know. The department says it does.

Mr. CONRY. If that necessity still exists, upon what authority does the gentleman proceed to eliminate two?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have repeated three or four times to the House that I was advised by numerous gentlemen that this bill could not be passed at this time if it provided for four revenue cutters; that it could be passed if it provided for two, and I would rather have two now and two next year than none at all.

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONRY. Has the gentleman made any effort to pass this legislation through the House in the form in which it was presented here?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am making motions, and if the gentleman can outvote me he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. How did the gentlemen who practically threatened the gentleman from Georgia propose to defeat these two propositions?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think they thought they could get more votes against it than I could for it. That is what they seemed to think. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin if that is untrue he can demonstrate it right here by voting down my motion to amend, and I will not get mad with him.

Mr. COOPER. That is not the point. I wondered why the gentleman yielded to what was tantamount to a threat—that if he did not strike out those two he could not get any?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not call it a threat. I was trying to make an arrangement to consider and pass this bill.

Mr. COOPER. It amounted to a threat. The gentleman was told that unless he struck out two of those ships, which the Government declared to be necessary originally and which the Senate provided for, he could not get any. That is what the statement amounts to—a threat.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman would state to me that he thought it looked like rain and that I had better carry my umbrella, I would not call that a threat. I would carry the umbrella or I would stay home.

Mr. COOPER. That is not a parallel case. There are no gentlemen in this House who can make it rain.

Mr. ADAMSON. But they can bring on a storm. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. I wanted to know what parliamentary tactics were to be invoked.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know a thing in the world to prevent the gentleman from Wisconsin defeating my motion if he can get votes enough to do it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. The report says, with respect to the vessel for New York Harbor:

(4) The $100,000 vessel of the third class, for service as anchorage patrol boat in New York Harbor, is to replace the Manhattan. This vessel is 40 years old; her iron hull is about rusted out; her boiler and machinery are obsolete in type, and nearly worn out. It is with great difficulty that this craft is kept patched up for service, which, at the best, she performs very inefficiently.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that; but it is also true that New York is so close to town that there are lots of floating craft around there which they can make arrangements to get quickly if they get in distress, something they could not do on the Gulf or on the Maine coast or on the Pacific coast. If the gentleman thought he needed an overcoat and a pair of shoes and he did not have enough money to buy both at once, he would decide which he needed the most.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of confidence in the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and in his judgment in relation to what he is able to do with relation to this bill. I think it is wrong and a great mistake to strike out two of these vessels. We need them on the Pacific coast, and we need some in Alaska; and if I did not believe that the gentleman knew what he was talking about I would make the point of no quorum now and do everything I could to prevent the passage of this bill if it is so amended, because I do not think that these two vessels ought to be stricken out; but I realize the fact that sometimes you have to take what you can get.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Washington, and I believe the quickest way for us to get them on the Pacific coast is to provide these two now and get two next winter—and I believe we can get them next winter.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have confidence in what the gentleman says, and under those circumstances I will not make the point of no quorum. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks by inserting a copy of a letter I have received from the steamboat companies of Puget Sound, showing the necessity for action to make less hazardous the navigation of the waters of Alaska. I sent a copy of that letter to each Member of the House and Senate. Certainly the facts therein detailed tell a startling story of the Government's neglect to take necessary steps to protect life and property in Alaskan waters. The necessity for prompt action is great, for since the Government has determined to construct railroads in Alaska the traffic in these waters will largely increase.

SEATTLE, February 12, 1914.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The striking of an uncharted rock at Gambier Bay in southeastern Alaska by the steamship State of California on August 17, 1913, resulting in the loss of the vessel and of 32 lives, following the striking of an uncharted rock by the steamship Mariposa in Sumner Straits on August 13, 1912, and by the steamship Ohio in Tongass Narrows on July 14, 1909, emphasizes the need of a resurvey of the main ship channels of the inside passage of southeastern Alaska. The charts published by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey show a depth of 12½ fathoms (75 feet) where the steamship State of California struck, a depth of 111 fathoms (666 feet) where the steamship Mariposa struck, and a depth of 30 fathoms (180 feet) where the steamship Ohio struck.

Tongass Narrows and Sumner Straits are stretches of water which have been used by vessels since the inception of trade to Alaska. Gambier Bay has been used for the past two years, since a cannery industry was established therein. The steamship State of California had made 16 trips in and out of this bay during that time, and there have been several other vessels employed in the trade.

These rocks are what are known as pinnacle formations, which are peculiar to the waters of southeastern Alaska, and their character is such that they frequently escape the sounding lead where the usual method of survey is followed.

The officials of the Coast Survey express the opinion that the only way in which the presence of pinnacle rocks in the main ship channels can be ascertained is by wire dragging, and in this opinion seafaring men concur. To undertake this work for the entire distance between the boundary line and the northern limits of the inside passage will require additional equipment and larger appropriations. We submit that the number of passengers traveling on vessels navigating these waters and the large increase in the number of vessels employed in the trade justify the Government in incurring whatever expense may be necessary to locate these hidden pinnacles.

If a bill for the building of railroads in Alaska passes Congress, there will be a large increase in the movement of merchandise and construction material and in the number of people traveling, and the vessels handling the increased business resulting from the opening up of Alaska will use the inside passage.

While the value of the merchandise carried by vessels plying the waters referred to, and the value of the vessel themselves, is large, we feel that the protection of human life to the greatest possible extent is of paramount importance, and should influence the granting of sufficient appropriations to enable the Department of Commerce to institute immediately the work of wire dragging the main ship channels, and to prosecute it with the utmost dispatch.

There have been and are to-day various measures under consideration for the better protection of life at sea. We submit that there is no measure of greater importance in this respect to the public of the Northwest than the resurvey of the inside passage of southeastern Alaska.

The department will require an increased appropriation for this work, and, we understand, has submitted, or will submit, to Congress its estimate of what is considered necessary for proper equipment and for field expenses, and we respectfully urge you to do everything in your power to secure this appropriation.

Respectfully, yours,

Vessels entering and clearing at southeastern Alaska ports in 1908, number 878; tonnage, 574,262; 1913, number 1,993; tonnage, 1,161,740.

Passengers arriving at and leaving ports in southeastern Alaska and ports reached via southeastern Alaska in 1910, 44,685; 1913, 43,339.

Imports into southeastern Alaska and to ports reached via southeastern Alaska in 1908, $8,852,234; 1913, $13,704,650.

Largest passenger vessel in the regular trade to southeastern Alaska ports in 1908, 1,615 gross tons; 1913, 3,158 gross tons.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker, I see according to the report here that the vessel provided for in this bill has been unanimously recommended by the committee——

Mr. ADAMSON. And we are still unanimously for it.

Mr. CONRY (continuing). And it is to replace the Manhattan. The report says:

(4) The $100,000 vessel of the third class, for service as anchorage patrol boat in New York Harbor, is to replace the Manhattan. This vessel is 40 years old; her iron hull is about rusted out; her boiler and machinery are obsolete in type and nearly worn out. It is with great difficulty that this craft is kept patched up for service, which at the best she performs very inefficiently.

Now, that demonstrates the imperative necessity for this patrol boat in New York Harbor. Now, does the consideration which has moved the chairman of this committee to eliminate this provision seem more powerful and more paramount than the necessity that is demonstrated in the opinion of the committee in its report?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would rather have two now and two next winter than to have none at all, and that seems to me to be the alternative. The gentleman can vote me down if he can get votes enough.

Mr. CALDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. As I understand, this item has been recommended by the Department of Commerce——

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course, it has over and over again, but by the Treasury Department not by the Department of Commerce.

Mr. CALDER. I recall distinctly when I was a member of the gentleman's committee this item was recommended, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we ought here to-day in this House insist upon this item staying in the bill. For one I am not willing to subscribe to any suggestion made by anybody off the floor of this House that a matter of this kind be omitted, and for one I propose that the item stay in the bill, and I hope the House will stand by me on that proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman can outvote me, well and good; I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND] who complimented me by saying he expected to get some information from me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have the greatest confidence in the amount of information which the chairman of this committee possesses.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman has repeatedly stated on the floor of this House that unless we vote down two of these boats which he has recommended should be placed in the bill we can not get any boats of this class. Now, that is very important information, and if the gentleman is at liberty to give us the source of it I should appreciate his kindness.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose if the gentleman will make up a combination of his information, his intuition, and his knowledge derived from experience in this House he can answer that without my telling him anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is a Georgia answer.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I am confident the gentleman from Georgia did not yield except when the pressure became overmastering. I understand—not officially—that the greatest reason that was given for the reducing of these four revenue cutters to two was the fact that we have the greatest revenue cutter in this House, known to the world as the Ways and Means Committee of the House [applause], that has reduced the general fund from $123,000,000 of last October to $75,000,000 today——

Mr. ADAMSON. I object to the gentleman trifling——

Mr. SLOAN (continuing). So your Ways and Means Committee of the House takes the place of these two additional revenue cutters, and therefore I am supporting the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman trifling with my young affections. He gave me an intimation of that witticism, and I told him I would object to the gentleman's perpetrating that on this House this afternoon, because it is not up to his standard, and I would not have yielded to him if I had thought he was going to inflict that upon us.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Not at all. Let us vote.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not take orders from the gentleman, as he seems to take orders from others.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. ADAMSON If the gentleman from New York will not crack any jokes like the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LEVY. I understand it is highly important to have this New York boat at the present time.

Mr. ADAMSON. No doubt of it.

Mr. LEVY. With the coming of the Panama Exposition and with all the great battleships coming, we have no boat there at all. This boat is so old it is ready to blow up at any time.

Mr. ADAMSON. The boats are so thick there you can not get across the river and get into the town hardly. You are afraid of getting run into all the time, there are so many of them in the way.

Mr. LEVY. But it is highly important to have this boat in the New York Harbor.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have said that a dozen times, Mr. Speaker. I wish we could build a hundred.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALDER, Mr. LEVY, and Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington demanded a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following: "Provided, That in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury any of the revenue cutters provided for in this act or any other revenue cutters now or hereafter in commission may be used to extend medical aid to the crews of American vessels engaged in the deep-sea fisheries, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe; and the said Secretary is hereby authorized to detail for duty on revenue cutters such surgeons and other persons of the Public Health Service as he may deem necessary."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary advises me that this will entail no additional expense. He advises me that they have to use cutters up that way very often anyway, and he will detail surgeons of the Public Health Service, so that it will involve no additional expense.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to strike out one of those semicolons and insert a comma and insert the word "and."

Mr. SIMS. Which one?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not care which one.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 8, by striking out the semicolon after the figures "$250,000" and inserting a comma and the word "and."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended in conformity with the text.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill (H. R. 3328) of similar tenor will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15762) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to four hours, two hours to be controlled by myself and two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]; and I will say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that out of the two hours under my control I shall take care of the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Thirty minutes is all I ask for. I ask that the gentleman from Virginia yield that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Very well.

Mr. COOPER. Would not the gentleman from Virginia consent to have that time increased 10 minutes on a side? I have requests for 2 hours and 40 minutes, but I will cut them down to 2 hours and 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that request.

Mr. COOPER. Very well, then; I withdraw it.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I make that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 4 hours and 20 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Four hours, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] just asked that 20 minutes be added.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. He withdrew that.

The SPEAKER. Very well. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 4 hours, 2 hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and 2 hours by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and that 30 minutes of the Democratic time shall go to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. COOPER. And two hours on this side under my control?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] will take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with Mr. FINLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15762, the Diplomatic and Consular bill. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15762) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, carries a total of $4,496,202.66. The bill carries $685,560 more than the bill for the current year. The estimates were $636,400 more than the appropriations for the current year. The bill carries $49,160 more than the estimates, but that difference is due to the fact that since the estimates were sent in the Secretary of State has asked for additional appropriations which the Committee on Foreign Affairs voted to allow.

The increase of $685,000 over the appropriations of last year consists largely of $440,000 appropriated for legation and embassy buildings and $200,000 for important international congresses. There is an appropriation of $150,000 for an embassy building at Tokyo, one of $150,000 for an embassy building at the City of Mexico, and an appropriation of $140,000 for a legation building at Berne, Switzerland. These appropriations are authorized by law, and the committee thought it wise to begin making appropriations this year for the building of our embassies. The wisdom of making these particular appropriations can be discussed when the bill is considered under the five-minute rule.

We also thought it wise to make appropriations for certain international congresses.

These international conferences, or rather the more important of them, are the fifth conference of American States, which meets in the city of Santiago, Chile, in September of this year, and for which we have provided $75,000; the second Pan American Scientific Congress, which meets in Washington in October, 1915, for which we have provided $35,000; the nineteenth conference of the Interparliamentary Union, for which we have provided $50,000; and the fifteenth International Congress against Alcoholism, which meets in 1915, and for which we have provided $40,000.

We have increased the amount available for the hire of clerks at embassies and legations from $75,000 to $100,000, in order to thoroughly Americanize our foreign missions.

The State Department has this to say on this subject:

CLERKS AT EMBASSIES AND LEGATIONS.

I have recommended an increase in the appropriation for this object from $75,000 to $100,000.

The law which requires clerks at embassies and legations to be American citizens, while praiseworthy and safeguarding, involves a much larger expenditure for clerk hire than was the case when foreigners could be appointed. It is impossible to find capable young American citizens who are willing to go abroad as clerks at embassies or legations without fair compensation, required, as they are, to pay their own traveling expenses. The appropriation of $75,000 heretofore made for this object is found to be inadequate. It is entirely apportioned among the different missions, so that when unusual conditions arise, such as have for some time existed in Mexico, the department has found itself unable to make provision from the present appropriation for the additional clerical services made necessary by the greatly increased work of the mission.

Moreover, allotments made to some of the missions are insufficiently attractive to tempt efficient American citizens. Furthermore, the establishment of a separate mission to Paraguay will require an additional expenditure for clerk hire. The department is of the opinion that it should have at its command an appropriation for clerks at embassies and legations sufficiently large to obtain for all efficient and trustworthy American clerical service, and have, in addition, a surplus fund from which it could draw to meet the additional demands which unusual conditions, possible at any of the missions, may require. It is thought that the sum of $100,000 will be sufficiently large, and this amount is asked for.

We provided for an increase in the contingent fund for foreign missions, in accordance with a request of the Secretary of State, amounting to $33,435.

The committee has done all it could to keep the appropriations down to as reasonable an amount as possible, and I trust that the appropriations as recommended by the committee will meet with the approval of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and unless the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] wants to speak now——

Mr. COOPER. I would like to yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if it would be just as agreeable to the gentleman from Ohio, some members of the committee would like to speak this afternoon, and I would like to yield to them.

Mr. FESS. I had just as lief they should speak to empty seats as myself.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Then I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] 30 minutes.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the chairman of our committee that I have this opportunity to express some thoughts upon a subject that might possibly have been more pertinent at the time the recent naval appropriation bill was under consideration, had it not gone out on a point of order. It was my intention at that time to have spoken upon that bill, as it has to do with the provision for a Government-owned and Government-operated armor-plate plant. As I have devoted some time of late to the study of this subject, I have been impressed with the fact that it is next in importance to the one concerning the strength and adequacy of our Navy and the resultant question whether it shall be increased each year by one battleship or two battleships.

I do not know how many of my colleagues have given any thought or attention to this subject, but if they have they must have been impressed with the fact that for at least 10 years of the 30 years past during which armor plate has been made and furnished for the Government, most of the time by our own manufacturers, we have been compelled to pay a price somewhat above 40 per cent more than the Government estimates of what it would cost if the manufacture of armor plate was conducted by the Government itself. Away back in 1897, I believe, a proposition was made by the Illinois Steel Co., upon certain conditions as to output, to the effect that it would supply for a term of years all the armor plate needed by the Government of the United States at the rate of about $240 a ton; that is, about half the average price paid a year previous to the manufacturers of this country by our own Government. That is even a lower figure than what the Government experts have estimated as being the cost at which they themselves could make armor plate, based upon a total capacity of 20,000 tons a year, which, I understand, the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, has recommended as being desirable. The company's offer, however, did not specify face-hardened plates.

I want to digress here for a moment to say that I do not take the position that the privately owned and privately conducted enterprises with which the Government deals are dishonest or extortionate; and when I voted for one battleship the other day in the naval appropriation bill I did not thereby indorse some of the insinuations made by a few of those who advocated a single battleship—that there was dishonesty or collusion on the part of our Government Navy officials with shipbuilding concerns. I can not believe that. In justice to the manufacturers of armor plate in this country in years past, let it be also said that it was a new business for them. Until 25 years ago all the armor plate which we purchased was manufactured abroad. It was a new industry, and it was very expensive to make armor plate.

From the inception of the manufacture of armor plate in this country down to the present time there have been made some very marked improvements and at great expense to the manufacturers. The first improvement probably had to do more with the admixture of the metals; and, in order to make the plate hard enough to withstand the ballistic tests that were applied to it by these powerful guns of ours, a composition of nickel was used. Later on, finding that even with that composition it was not hard enough to withstand the impact and explosive force of the shells projected against it, there was developed a new process of hardening the plate called surface hardening, and known also as the Harvey process from the name of its inventor. That work was also attended with great expense. Practically all these improvements both at home and abroad were protected by patents. But in view of the fact that for the past 10 years or more there has been little, if any, decrease in the price of this material by the three great concerns that furnish it to the Government, if there is not an actual combination that absolutely controls the price of this armor plate, there is a marked coincidence in the bids, because the lowest price at which we have been able to get this armor plate in the last 10 years has been an average of about $420 a ton, and I believe $440 a ton during the past 2 years, and this, too, when there has been great fluctuation in the prices of the raw materials. Knowing something about the cost at least of pig iron, I was somewhat surprised to read in the reported hearings on this subject before the Naval Committee that in 1894, 1895, and 1896, during the panic years, when pig iron sold at the lowest rate ever known, which product contains almost all the raw materials that go into armor plate, nevertheless the price paid by this Government for armor plate was the highest, approximating an average of $625 a ton. Within a year of that time and during the period when this Government was paying upward of $550 a ton, it is a well-known fact that one of the great concerns in this country sold the same kind of armor plate to the Russian Government for $249 per ton.

Conceding that there is something in the argument that the manufacturers of this country put up when they say it does not necessarily follow in all cases that in fairness to the American consumer they should sell their products and their output at the same price at home as that at which they sell it to foreigners abroad, yet the disparity presented in these figures could hardly be justifiable.

Every manufacturer knows that there are times when there comes a glut of his product in the market. He realizes that in order to keep the establishment operating at the fullest extent, employing the largest number of men possible, in order to make the cost of each unit as low as possible—and, I believe, in not a few instances also to keep his men employed in times of depression—he must get an outlet for the surplus product. Under such conditions there have been times when, in order to get rid of such surplus product, a part of the output has been marketed abroad and sold in open competition with foreign manufacturers at a figure below what was charged here.

But there is another reason, Mr. Chairman, why I am in favor of our armor plate being manufactured by the Government. Not alone on account of price—and it has been shown that we can almost cut it in two—but because war raises exigencies and necessities that differentiate this proposition from many others of which Government ownership is advocated and against which I would, on principle, place my vote with the conservative Members in this House.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. I understand the gentleman is in favor of the Government establishing an armor-plate factory, for one reason, because you can get better armor plate?

Mr. SHARP. Yes; I believe it would come to that.

Mr. CLINE. Does the gentleman expect by that to establish a competition in prices between the Government and private manufacturers, and so reduce the price?

Mr. SHARP. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question, because I may use, in illuminating that point, the language of Secretary of the Navy Daniels when he said at the hearings recently, in answer to about the same question, that he was in favor of Government ownership of an armor-plate factory even if the Government turned the key in the door and locked it and threw the key away, because the very fact that the Government had it within its power to establish a manufacturing plant to compete against the individual or outside private enterprises would have the effect, as he said, as in all other industries, of lowering the price.

Mr. CLINE. Carrying that proposition a little further, to what extent would the gentleman go to induce the Government to manufacture all of its appliances, munitions, and supplies that enter into the construction of the Navy? Where would the gentleman draw the line if he drew it at all?

Mr. SHARP. The line where the Government should cease to engage in private enterprise must be left largely to the sound sense of Congress itself. There are limitations beyond which the Government should not go. I recognize that. In fact, my position has always been, on general principles, against the Government embarking in private enterprises unless the Government itself is in the position of consumer buying a trust-controlled product. It was in part for this reason that I recently voted in favor of the so-called Alaskan railway bill. The situation in that far-off country presented unusual conditions. Nobody doubted that there was no present promise of a speedy development of its resources, consisting of vast riches in timber, coal, and other minerals, if left to private enterprise. The decisive vote by which it carried in the House—231 to 87—however, by no means reflects the correct sentiment of the Members when applied to the subject in the abstract of Government ownership of railways.

Along this line, as in opposition to Government ownership, I wish also to refer to the argument presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] the other day. There is no man in this House who has a higher admiration or more kindly friendship than I for the able and plain spoken gentleman from Texas.

It was, however, rather suprising to see that gentleman, after using most of the hour allotted to him in speaking about the socialistic tendencies of the times and criticizing things in general, and especially characterizing the Progressive side of the House as being visionary and bordering on the line of socialism, finally wind up himself on horseback, with flaming sword, at the head of an army posing as a reformer in the City of Mexico. After spending much of his time in describing the scenes of disturbance in this country, and especially referring to the Rockefeller class and the striking miners in the Colorado mines as both equally responsible for the bad conditions in this country, he concluded by proclaiming his purpose to be, if given free rein, to ride at the head of a marching army into the City of Mexico and there reform conditions that certainly, according to his own testimony, could not be very much worse than we have here at home. It is true when asked the question what he would do after he got there and whether his stay would be permanent, he discreetly declined to disclose the full purpose of his quixotic expedition.

But I look with considerable doubt upon the wisdom of any course of action that will take you into trouble and then leave you there without furnishing some sort of a diagram by means of which you can get out of the difficulty. The gentleman advocated the policy of marching with his army into Mexico, and said he would make only one trip of it. To pursue that policy, if it means to permanently occupy that country, would be to post the United States upon every international highway in the world as the country of the most monumental hypocrites that ever existed. I am fully in accord with the policy of the present administration.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. Not at present. I do not know whether any reflection was intended upon the present policy when the gentleman said that he was with the administration in all of its policies, "whatever they may be"; but I want to say in reply to that statement that I do not believe he is with the present administration in any of its foreign policies, especially as they apply to Mexico, if he would attempt to acquire any portion of its territory by conquest. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask in all sincerity, and for the purpose of ascertaining, if possible, what the foreign policy of the administration is, especially with regard to Mexico. I do not know, and I have been often asked that question.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question I want frankly to say that while I am not in the close confidence of either the President or the Secretary of State, yet I do believe that the policy of the administration, the foreign policy to which the gentleman refers, as it applies to all nations, is one founded in absolute justice, good will, and friendship; and I believed, voting as I recently did for the repeal of the canal-toll exemption, that that was one of the steps taken by the administration in the interest of good will and justice to all nations. As far as I can interpret the foreign policy as it applies to Mexico, I would say that the same broad, humanitarian purpose exists there. I can not believe, I do not believe, and I never could subscribe to any policy which, under the guise of friendship—and I disclaim that there is any thought of that kind in the present administration—would demand entering with a conquering army into Mexico and there acquire and permanently annex one foot of its soil.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the policy of the administration in regard to Mexico? We have been told for months that in a few days Gen. Huerta would be disposed of; that he would either resign or be deposed by his enemies at home. What is the purpose of the administration when Huerta is disposed of? What is the policy of this administration as to a Government for Mexico for the immediate future?

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question, I will say that while it is difficult to predict with certainty the events down there of even a day in advance, yet I have such confidence in its wisdom and integrity of purpose that whatever action is taken will be entirely just and humanitarian; and I will say further, if I may assume for a moment the rôle of prophet and put my answer in the negative rather than in the affirmative form, that emphatically it is not the purpose of the administration to acquire by conquest any territory in Mexico. That the restoration of order and the establishing of stable government in that troubled country will yet come to pass—and that without war—is my hope and belief.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. For a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is in the same frame of mind as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], and is willing to follow the administration whether he knows what its purpose is or not?

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question I would say that I am willing to follow the administration for the reason I have just given to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], because I have abiding faith in the wisdom and justice of its purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And the gentleman is willing to do that whether he knows what its policy is or not?

Mr. SHARP. I am willing to trust to those who are in a position to know better than I the events occurring in Mexico. But, Mr. Chairman, I can not here take any more time in answering these questions. I would be very glad to answer the gentlemen out of courtesy, but I can not take all of my time in doing so.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The fact is, that nobody knows what the foreign policy of the administration is.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, if I did not have such high regard and feeling of friendship for my Texas colleagues, especially my good friends Mr. GARNER and Mr. SMITH, who represent a border line of territory of the modest length of about 800 miles, more or less, along the Rio Grande, I might say that there would be some justice in placing some of those in authority down there upon the firing line, should we have actual hostilities with Mexico, because most of the war talk has come from that direction.

Now, my colleagues, I must confess frankly to the House that I have another purpose in speaking upon the armor-plate proposition. I not only believe in, but strongly commend, the wisdom of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, whose record has been most admirable, in advocating Government ownership of armor-plate factories, and I know that you will excuse me if I take a few minutes of that time in saying that I have also a local interest as to where this industry shall be located.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for just one question before he proceeds further?

Mr. SHARP. Simply for a question.

Mr. CLINE. We all know that the gentleman has had large business experience in manufacture, and he says he has investigated the manufacture of armor plate——

Mr. SHARP. The subject of it.

Mr. CLINE. The subject of the manufacture of armor plate. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether in his investigations he came to the conclusion that there existed an agreement or understanding between the private manufacturers of armor plate to maintain present prices; and if so, whether he believes that the Government ought to go into the manufacture of armor plate as a competitor of private concerns that now manufacture armor plate as the best method of reducing prices, or whether he thinks the Government might select some other method that would be equally conclusive and not go into business itself?

Mr. SHARP. In answer to that question, Mr. Chairman, I would say that there is only one other alternative to the Government itself embarking in the manufacture of its own armor plate, and that is to permit it to be done by private parties. The latter plan has been the practice for the last 30 years. I do not know that I can better answer that question than to refer him to the two very exhaustive reports of the Secretaries of the Navy, one in 1906, under a Republican administration, and the other in June of last year, under the Democratic administration, both of which boards of investigators advocate a Government-owned armor-plate factory. Now, as to whether there has been any collusion or combination upon the part of the competing, or supposed to be competing, concerns, these private manufacturing plants, I am not certain that there has been such an understanding or combination; but, as I stated in opening my remarks, there has been such a coincidence in prices asked, such a similarity in amounts, that one would very strongly infer, it seems to me, that there was some kind of an understanding and lack of competition between them. We do know that the Secretary of the Navy has found it necessary within the past year to adopt rather drastic means for the purpose of getting a more reasonable bid.

Mr. TAVENNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. For a question.

Mr. TAVENNER. Answering the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] as to whether competition will bring down prices, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that the naval appropriation bill of June 7, 1900, gave the Secretary of the Navy authority to build an armor plant if he could not obtain a reasonable bid from the armor ring, and that simply the insertion of such a provision in the naval appropriation bill caused the price of armor plate to fall from $413 to $345 a ton, and the mere fact that the Secretary of the Navy had authority to build a plant if he could not get a fair bid saved the Government something like $10,000,000. Simply the threat of competition reduced the price of armor to this extent; but as time passed and the moral effect of the threat wore off, the price of armor went up, and has been going up ever since.

Mr. SHARP. I think from a reading of the reports that the gentleman's statement is fairly corroborated. Now, if I may just finish—I will not say uninterrupted by questioners ,because I must confess I am a little more at home and somewhat more firmly satisfied in my contention in what I shall say in the remainder of my talk than I may have been upon our foreign policy—I am very sure and certain, Mr. Chairman, that when it comes to considering the location for an armor-plate factory we have in Lorain, Ohio, the iron and steel city of Lake Erie, in my own fourteenth Ohio district, the best location in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I congratulate the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHARP. I have sometimes thought that had Proctor Knott, famous as a wit, who regaled and entertained his auditors in a marked degree within the walls of this Chamber over 40 years ago when he dilated and expatiated upon the future growth and promise of Duluth—of course, in a sarcastic vein—I have often thought that had the eloquent Kentuckian been permitted to have lived and spoken 40 years later than he did, he might have found that his reputation, great even as it was as a wit, was still greater as a true prophet. For Duluth, although it is not located in my district, is nevertheless a city that to-day bears out to the fullest extent all that was so humorously predicted of it by him more than a generation ago. It is rightly called the "Zenith City of the Lakes."

I hope that I may not be considered immoderate and extravagant when, in calling attention to the claims of my own city, I say that, great as is Duluth, the city of the North, we have a city of greater promise at Lorain. Why? Because while Duluth is noted almost entirely on account of its export business as an iron-ore and grain center, garnering the grain of the fertile expanse of the Northwest and also the ore of those great iron mines of the Mesabi Range, yet my city of Lorain not only manufactures out of that raw iron ore, finished products in varied form, but she supplies the coal for the hearths and firesides and factories of Duluth, and, last of all, she furnishes and builds in her harbor the immense boats that, laden with the coal of Ohio's mines, sail northward and bring back in their holds many thousands of tons of the ore.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that Lorain would be the most economical place in America at which to build an armor-plate plant?

Mr. SHARP. I am glad the question is asked by the gentleman from Illinois, because it gives me the opportunity to answer yes, emphatically.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us why?

Mr. SHARP. I shall be pleased to answer that question, though I do not often assume this rôle of talking to my colleagues.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman talks so very well and interestingly that he ought to talk every day.

Mr. SHARP. Let me use the remainder of my time in answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and in explaining why Lorain is the place most economically adapted for the manufacture of armor plate, as he puts it, in America. Twenty years ago the late Tom L. Johnson, former mayor of Cleveland, served several terms as a Member, and a very able Member, of this House. He was great as a statesman and great as a business man. Those who knew of his political career might well have thought that all his powers had been fully used in that direction alone; but when his other side—that as a successful manufacturer and promoter of big enterprises—is considered, we might well say with Goldsmith of his schoolmaster in his "Deserted Village":

> And still they gaz'd, and still the wonder grew
> That one small head could carry all he knew.

But 20 years ago Tom L. Johnson, in looking about, went out of his home city of Cleveland over to the neighboring town of Lorain, then having but 5,000 or 6,000 people—although to-day it has 35,000—and there saw the wonderful advantages of Lorain as a place for the cheap manufacture of iron and steel. There he located a great manufacturing plant that employed in his day 4,000 or 5,000 men. Later he sold it to the United States Steel Co., and they have since more than doubled that plant. We have employed there now, when running full capacity, about 10,000 or 11,000 men. Those great furnaces, turning out 3,000 tons of pig iron a day and turning it out every day in the year, if devoted to that line of manufacture alone could produce 30 miles of track of the heaviest steel rails—or reaching nearly from here to Baltimore—every 24 hours.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it be the gentleman's idea to take this private plant over and make it a Government institution?

Mr. SHARP. Not at all. I was only calling attention to these conditions, in answer to the question of the gentleman, why it was a place where iron and steel could be economically manufactured, because the merest tyro in the business knows that the chief ingredients used in the manufacture of those products are coke and iron ore.

Now, further, as to the advantage of that location. I am not going to take the time of the House to read at any length from the report and the recommendations of the Ordnance Board of last year, but I will quote, in part, the following observations of that board in its report as to requisites of a site for an armor-plate plant:

Several points must be considered in deciding on the site for an armor plant. The principal ones are the following:
First. Geological character of site.
Second. Facilities for securing raw material.
Third. The labor market.
Fourth. Facilities for delivering completed material.
The forging presses used in the manufacture of armor and of gun forgings are very heavy and operate under a very high hydraulic pressure. Consequently the foundations for them must be of the firmest character, and it is not thought that these machines could be properly installed except on rock bottom. It is therefore desirable and practically necessary that the site selected should offer rock bottom at a moderate depth—probably not more than 30 feet.
The labor market must be given some consideration, although it is quite probable that if the industry were established in any vicinity the necessary labor could ultimately be secured, provided there was a fair prospect of continuous work. To establish a factory, however, in a location in which no allied industry is now established would cause delays in securing the necessary labor and would undoubtedly increase the cost of manufacture for a considerable time.
As to the facilities for shipping completed material, a tidewater site would undoubtedly be best from this point of view, since water transportation is cheaper than rail transportation, and does not impose conditions as to size and weight of armor plates which are imposed by land transportation. The cost of land transportation for armor plates is not excessive, but the sizes of cars, dimensions of tunnels, bridges, etc., have placed a practical limit on the size of armor plates. If these conditions were not imposed it might be found best in the future to make larger armor plates, which would be an advantage from the point of view of the efficiency of the armor in protecting the vessels to which it was supplied.

First, as to foundations: When we dig 6 or 8 feet down below the surface we get a solid shale bed underneath almost that entire city. That is one requirement fully met.

Another is the transportation by water. From the harbor at Lorain can be shipped by water route freight to any seaport in the world. It has also become quite a railroad center.

In this connection, further, speaking about the steel rails made in Lorain, let me tell my colleagues a fact that may not be generally known. We have all heard a certain class of political economists advocate municipal ownership of about everything, especially the ownership of public utilities. They always point with pride to Glasgow as the one most successful exponent of their views. They point to the fact that the street railway systems of Glasgow are so much better managed for the interests of the people than they would be if conducted by private enterprise. Let me say to you that although that city may be far ahead of us in its civil government, yet when it came to supplying the rails for their municipally owned street car system they had to come to Lorain to get the rails, and that, too, right under the noses of the British manufacturers in full competition.

But there are other reasons. Lorain has never been plagued—and I do not use the word in any offensive sense—by conditions such as you unfortunately see out in the mines of Colorado to-day. My good friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who a few minutes ago asked me some questions, certainly knows that more than one great industry in his home city of Chicago has had to leave that city and get away from it because they could not exist in peace there on account of labor difficulties. I know that several years ago nearly all the piano manufacturers in that city had to get outside of the city limits, in the smaller towns, where they could get more healthy labor conditions. But in Lorain we have had our great manufacturing establishments, employing in the aggregate more than 12,000 men, running smoothly, without a single strike. We have there the satisfactory labor conditions that the Government should have in order to operate an armor-plate plant successfully.

Then, above all, we have the magnificent harbor at Lorain. In this connection let me take this opportunity to give my thanks not only to the House but also to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, because I never yet went before them and asked for anything for the harbor at Lorain that they did not give it, and I have asked considerable. Why has it been given? Because the Board of Engineers have for years past recognized that that is one of the finest harbors along the Lakes, and that it has been favored by nature for the most economical transportation of raw materials as well as manufactured goods. The official figures show that during the past three years the average tonnage going in and out of that harbor aggregates about 6,500,000 tons a year. So that, assuming that our armor-plate factory is located in the city of Lorain, all these requirements set forth by the ordnance board just quoted will be met in an ideal way.

Lest I forget it, let me digress for a moment right here. I do not see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] in the Hall just now, but I will take the liberty to quote him. He is the author of a bill calling for the location of this project—which as yet I must admit is rather ethereal—at his home city of Rock Island, Ill. Meeting me to-day he said, "Why, Mr. SHARP, you have got up at Lorain, in your district, in my judgment, the best location in the United States for this plant."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. I will yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin wanted to ask me a question and I will now yield to him.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman speaks of the advantages of this magnificent harbor and how generous the Government has been in improving it. Does not he think, in view of the decision on the tolls question, that they ought to charge tolls there, and is it not wrong to subsidize ships going into that city?

Mr. SHARP. I only wish I had 30 minutes in which to answer the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman will need more than that.

Mr. SHARP. No; but I will refer the gentleman for my position on the tonnage tolls to a speech that I delivered in this House more than a year ago, in which I emphatically agreed with the gentleman. I believe that not only tonnage tolls ought to be applied to Panama, but, to be just and consistent—and I refer now only to the economical and not the international phase of the question—they ought to be applied to the tonnage on every vessel that traverses navigable harbors and waterways that are developed by Government appropriations.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think where a county or State has improved a highway that a tollgate ought to be put across it and the people compelled to pay?

Mr. SHARP. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. COOPER. There is absolutely no difference in principle.

Mr. SHARP. I want to say further that while the Government has been generous in improving the harbor at Lorain, yet that same city has bowed her back under the burden of bonded indebtedness, aggregating $600,000, as a further subsidy to the great vessel owners whose boats traverse those lakes and harbors. That is why I am in favor of putting tolls upon the tonnage of the Great Lakes, just as I am tolls on the tonnage that uses the Panama Canal.

Mr. SHREVE. For what purpose was the bond issue made?

Mr. SHARP. It was for deepening and widening the river that was almost exclusively used by those steamship companies. I want to further add that if I was a shipper of goods, whether by railroad over a line of steel rails or by water in those great vessels, both kinds of carriers would look just alike to me, and I do not believe in favoring either at the Government expense.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHARP. Certainly.

Mr. HAYES. I want to ask the gentleman if he claims there is any combination or trust among the vessels on the Lakes?

Mr. SHARP. I wish I had more time to speak on that phase of the question, but I will refer the gentleman to the report of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], as chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Chapter 11 of that report, on 'Steamship company affiliations on the Great Lakes," is very instructive and illuminating, as it deals with these combinations.

Mr. HAYES. I want the gentleman's opinion, because I know he is familiar with the subject.

Mr. SHARP. I know that the greatest subsidy in the last seven years is the $35,000,000 that has been given out by your constituents and mine for improvement of the harbors, channels, and locks on the Great Lakes in the form of Government appropriations. While I favor the continued improvement of our waterways by the Government, yet I believe the special beneficiaries of this great outlay of money—now amounting to nearly $50,000,000 annually—ought to be taxed for at least the upkeep of such improvements.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin use some of his time?

Mr. COOPER. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that I was going to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, but he is out.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, it is now 5 o'clock, and we have transacted a good deal of business. I wish the gentleman would move to rise.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FINLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15762) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN SETTLERS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5890) for the relief of settlers within the limits of the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately take up and resume the adjustment and adjudication of all rights and privileges relinquished, granted, conveyed, and confirmed to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Co., as the assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co., by the act of Congress approved February 8, 1887, and entitled "An act to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co., to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes," subject to all the provisions and conditions therein contained for the protection of actual settlers, their heirs and assigns.

SEC. 2. That on the application of persons to make entry in accordance with the provisions of the act aforesaid, the rights only of those who were actual settlers at the date of definite location, their heirs, or other persons to whom they may have assigned their possessory rights, prior to December 1, 1913, shall be given consideration as against the outstanding patent or patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Co.

SEC. 3. That in determining rights asserted by or on behalf of actual settlers, their heirs or assigns, proof showing actual settlement at the date of definite location and the existence of such settlement and occupancy at the present time shall be deemed prima facie evidence of the continuity of the settlement claim.

SEC. 4. That all claims adverse to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Co., or its successors in interest, which are not asserted as herein provided within the period of two years from the passage and approval of this act shall be deemed and considered forever barred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if this bill has been reported by a committee?

Mr. ASWELL. This bill has the unanimous and favorable report from the Public Lands Committee, representing all parties, and it is cordially indorsed by the General Land Office and the Department of the Interior.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I note that certain titles or deeds are practically confiscated by the terms of the bill. Is there any consideration given for the property taken?

Mr. ASWELL. There is no title confiscated; it is to quiet the title of the old settlers who have been on the lands for 30 or 40 years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. These titles are to be settled notwithstanding any patents that may have been heretofore issued?

Mr. ASWELL. It merely brings each case individually upon its own merits to the Land Office.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How much land is involved?

Mr. ASWELL. The original grant was three and a quarter million acres, but it has narrowed down now until it is located nearly all in my district. I do not know how many acres, but about forty or fifty thousand acres, and about 400 old settlers. I am very anxious to have something done with it before those old men pass to the beyond.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This bill was called up last Monday on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. ASWELL. Yes; and by a mistake was objected to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I notice when there was a larger attendance then in the House an objection was made to its consideration.

Mr. ASWELL. I will say that the objection was made through a misunderstanding, and the gentleman who made it is very anxious to have that objection withdrawn. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This bill involves a very large amount of land.

Mr. ASWELL. It puts the whole matter up to the Land Office.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is not one of those small private bills that ought to be taken up out of its order, when there are very few Members here, and I submit to the gentleman from Louisiana that if he is not absolutely sure of his ground it is a pretty dangerous precedent.

Mr. ASWELL. I am perfectly sure. I have been working upon this for over a year. I hope the gentleman will not object, because this is one of my first bills, and he has been a new Member himself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman from Louisiana if this bill confirms any titles to the railroad corporation, or does it confirm the title only to the actual settlers?

Mr. ASWELL. It brings every case to the Land Office upon its merits.

Mr. BORLAND. And the cases to be adjusted are those where the land has been brought into the hands of actual settlers?

Mr. ASWELL. It does not affect any land except that in the hands of actual settlers in 1882.

Mr. BORLAND. It does not relieve the corporation from any forfeiture of its own grants?

Mr. ASWELL. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has the Senate taken any action on the bill?

Mr. ASWELL. It has not. It has yet to go to the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there will be opportunity for further consideration of the bill, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman also asks unanimous consent that the substitute be considered instead of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. ASWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3432. An act to reinstate Frank Ellsworth McCorkle as a cadet at United States Military Academy.

ARMOR PLATE—EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of armor plate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. SPARKMAN, reference of the bill (H. R. 5502) providing for the marking and protection of the battle field known as Dade's Massacre, in Sumter County, Fla., and for the erection of a monument thereon, was changed from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 13, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 13, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast hidden the sources of Thy power beyond all our power of human thought to reach; but Thou hast revealed unto us Thy personal character, and we have found Thee to be a God of love. Thou hast spoken to us the last word of love. Thou hast performed already the highest and divinest act of love. We are persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. We pray that Thy Holy Spirit may shed abroad Thy love in our hearts. May we plan for the present, look to the future, and work for the accomplishment of the highest good, knowing that truth shall overcome error and the light of the perfect day shall some day shine away all the darkness. To this end do Thou guide us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the request?

Mr. SWANSON. It is that a very short statement, which will not take two pages, may be printed in the RECORD, made by Mr. HOLLAND, a Member of Congress from the second Virginia district, in regard to the advantages of Norfolk and the lower Chesapeake Bay as a naval base. It contains a great deal of valuable information, and as the naval appropriation bill will come up in the Senate in a few days, I think it will be a matter of interest to Senators to read it. I simply want to have it printed in the RECORD, where Senators will see it. There is no necessity to have it read at the desk. It will not take more than a page and a half, I think.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is rather unusual for the Senate to order the publication of a speech by a Member of the other body.

Mr. SWANSON. It is not a speech made in the House. It is a statement, and I think it would be of interest to Senators to have it appear in the RECORD. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am wondering when we are going to reform by excluding from the RECORD matters which are not properly a part of it.

Mr. SWANSON. We have not been doing that. We put petitions in the RECORD. A great deal of this matter has been included in a petition of the people of Norfolk, but I think this is a better and clearer statement of the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. E. E. HOLLAND, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I thank you very much for this opportunity of laying before you Norfolk's claims to the proposed dry dock. Virginia has no representative on your committee and on this account may be placed at some disadvantage. Your permission, however, to appear before you and discuss Norfolk's case with you, as best I can, is an evidence of your desire to be fair and impartial in your consideration of it, and to hear all that can be said on either side before any conclusion is reached. If you will permit me first to present our case and will then ask me such questions as you may desire me to answer, I shall very much appreciate it.

This is not, and should not be made, a sectional or political question. The fact is I had hoped that the time had come when we could consider questions of this kind in a spirit of broad patriotism and solely with reference to the good of the Navy and the good of the Nation. I had believed that the time had come when the narrow sectional spirit of other days had been abandoned, and when, with clearer vision, we could see beyond the limits of our own particular States and find need for improvements not to be located therein. Politics and sectionalism should never be allowed to interfere with our naval progress.

I am willing that this committee shall impartially consider the particular merit of each yard, and then vote for such improvements at each yard as will best promote the interest of the Navy and of the Nation, and without reference to the location of the improvement or to the interest of any particular individual or to any particular State therein. I have a strong conviction that patriotism demands that we shall follow such a course.

I wish that it shall be distinctly understood that I am not opposed to appropriations required for improvements actually needed at stations other than Norfolk. I am absolutely unwilling that my desire for needed improvements at the Norfolk yard shall in any way influence me to oppose needed or even similar improvements at other yards. I am opposed, however, to the mistaken policy of developing any yard without reference to its adaptability for the purposes for which its location best suits it. Such a policy has been too long followed, has resulted in large and unnecessary expenditures, and has not contributed to the military value or usefulness of the yards. In the interest of economy, as well as in the interest of the efficiency of the Navy, such a policy ought to be abandoned.

Everybody knows that every yard is not suitably located for shipbuilding and that every yard is not suitably located for ship docking, and that it is a useless waste of money to provide such equipment and facilities at points where they will not be needed or used for such purposes.

Hastily considered extensions, and without reference to any particular plan or purpose, ought not to be made, and the yards ought to be developed so as to make them of most value for general navy-yard work, and at the same time of most service to the Navy. If you will follow some well-matured plan, a practical and logical development can be had, the expenses of operation lessened, and the actual service of the yards increased. So far as I am concerned, I will say to you, in all frankness, that I do not ask for any improvements at the Norfolk yard that will not contribute to the public good and to the greater efficiency of the Navy.

Having made this general statement of my position with reference to navy-yard improvements and extensions, I desire now to submit to you for your consideration the reasons which have convinced me that certain improvements ought to be made at the Norfolk yard.

I can say nothing in favor of the Norfolk Navy Yard that has not repeatedly been said by Army and Navy experts, men whose trained judgment ought to be entitled to your confidence and to your serious consideration.

For the past 100 years every Secretary of the Navy and every commandant of the yard, with hardly a single exception, has made recommendations for its improvement and extension, and naval boards appointed from time to time to examine and report on its condition have repeatedly declared "that no yard belonging to the United States from its geographical position is more important."

As early as the year 1869, before the passions of the great Civil War had subsided, and when the area of the Norfolk yard was smaller by 272 acres than it is to-day, a naval board composed of Rear Admiral Stringham, Admiral Stribling, and Commodore S. P. Lee, appointed by the then Secretary of the Navy to investigate the condition of navy yards and make recommendations concerning them, reported with regard to the Norfolk Navy Yard as follows:

"This is considered the best site on the Atlantic seaboard for a large navy yard. It is situated near the capes of the Chesapeake Bay on the Elizabeth River. Its natural features—proximity to the sea, central position on the coast, mild climate, secure defense by land and sea, a large accessible harbor, safe from wind, sea, and ice; grand extent of fit and inexpensive land, supplying the most abundant and convenient water front, and almost natural basins, like Paradise Creek—are extremely favorable for the construction of a great and national navy yard for all purposes which modern naval warfare requires."

As late as 1912 Secretary of the Navy Meyer testified before the Committee on Naval Affairs as follows:

"I studied the conditions on the Atlantic coast from Charleston to Portsmouth and put the matter up to the General Board of the Navy, and after they had given their opinion I further assigned it to the joint Army and Navy board for consideration, and they reported that the ideal plan for the Navy would be to have two great naval bases on the Atlantic coast in harbors which would receive and could maintain the entire fleet and its auxiliaries. It appeared self-evident that the only two places which could receive the fleet and all its auxiliaries were Hampton Roads, where we have the Norfolk Navy Yard, and Narragansett Bay. If we were freshly confronted with the duty of locating and building the naval stations required on the Atlantic without regard to existing stations, the interests of the Navy and the Nation would be best served by the establishment of one first-class station on the coast north of the Delaware, equipped for docking, repairing, and provisioning at least half of the entire fleet, and one station of the same capacity at Norfolk."

And Admiral Mahan, generally recognized as one of our greatest naval experts, in Naval Strategy, pages 169–170, makes the following statement:

"Chesapeake Bay and New York, on our Atlantic coast, are two points clearly indicated by nature as primary bases of supply, and consequently for arsenals of chief importance. For these reasons they are also proper ports of retreat in case of a bad defeat, because of the resources that should be accumulated in them."

These statements, if any reliance whatever can be placed in the judgment of Army and Navy experts, furnish the most conclusive evidence that the Norfolk Navy Yard ought to be made one of the great naval bases of the country. Such a naval base should have ample docking and repair facilities and should be so equipped that ships could go there on short notice and be docked, repaired, coaled, supplied, and sent out again with a minimum loss of time. And if the interest of the Navy and of the Nation can be best served by the establishment of such a base, and this is the overwhelming opinion of all Army and Navy experts, then its equipment with proper docking and repair facilities for such a purpose ought not longer to be neglected. It already meets all the other essential requirements for such a naval base.

First. It is located on deep water. The Norfolk-Portsmouth Harbor, on which it is located, is one of the very best on the Atlantic coast, and is accessible at all seasons of the year. It has been so pronounced by ship captains of every nation of the world, by the greatest masters of rail and water transportation in this country, and by every naval board that has been appointed to examine it. It is free from obstruction, free from severe storms, and free from damage by ice. The depth of water from the yard to the sea, only 27 miles distant, is 35 feet, and additional depth, when desired, can be easily obtained and at comparatively small cost. The width of the channel is now 400 feet—will soon be increased to 600 feet—and is sufficiently wide to enable the largest ships of the Navy to reach it without difficulty. There is so little silting in the channel that this width and depth can be easily maintained. And the average range of tide in the river is only about 2½ feet, and never interferes with the safe and easy navigation of the harbor.

Some one, it is true, has suggested that the yard is located "on a little river"; but it is also true that the Norfolk-Portsmouth Harbor, in which it is located, together with Hampton Roads, which is a part of it, is big enough to handle annually more than 23,000,000 tons of water commerce, valued at more than a billion and a half dollars, and is also big enough to float the combined navies of the world.

Some doubt having been expressed as to the depth of the channel, I submit herewith a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, which reads as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
October 4, 1913.

Hon. E. E. HOLLAND,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 2d instant, I have the honor to inform you that the project for the improvement of Norfolk Harbor provides for a depth of 35 feet at mean low water, and on June 30, 1913, there existed a channel from deep water in Hampton Roads to above the Norfolk Navy Yard of not less than 35 feet at mean low water, but the controlling depth over Thimble Shoal, between Hampton Roads and the ocean was on June 30 only 34 feet at mean low water. It is expected, however, that the full project depth of 35 feet will soon be available over this shoal.

Very respectfully,
WM. T. ROSSELL,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

This project has now been completed and a survey has been asked for, with a view to securing a depth of 40 feet. With such a depth any battleship of the Navy can reach the station without difficulty. Two of the Navy's largest dreadnaughts did reach it and were successfully docked at this station only a few months ago.

The modern dreadnaught when leaving a navy yard, with all ammunition, coal, and stores aboard, will have a mean draft of 29 feet 9 or 10 inches, and probably an extreme draft of more than 30 feet. I have the following letter as my authority for this statement:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
January 15, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. HOLLAND: Referring to your inquiry of the 12th instant, I have the honor to inform you that the battleships New York, Texas, Nevada, and Oklahoma have a mean draft, under normal displacement—that is, with two-thirds coal, two-thirds ammunition, and two-thirds stores aboard—of 28 feet 6 inches. When leaving a yard, with all coal, ammunition, and stores aboard, they will have a mean draft of 29 feet 9 or 10 inches. Depending upon the distribution of stores, it is probable that each of these vessels will have an extreme draft at one end or other of the ship of more than 30 feet. With the increase in size of ships, it is unquestionable that drafts will be further increased.

Very sincerely,
R. M. WATT,
Chief Constructor, United States Navy.

The Philadelphia yard is located on the Delaware River. The Delaware River has a probable depth of 30 feet 1 inch at mean low water. It will take years of time and millions of money to complete the authorized project of 35 feet for that river. I have the following letter as my authority for this statement:

OFFICE OF CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
January 15, 1914.

Hon. E. E. HOLLAND,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I acknowledge receipt of your request of the 13th instant. I have the honor to advise you that the maximum draft that can be carried over the shoalest part of the Delaware River from the sea to the navy yard at Philadelphia is 30.1 at mean low water. The mean range of tide varies from 5.3 feet at Philadelphia to 6 feet at the head of the Delaware Bay. The width of this channel is 600 feet in the straight reaches and somewhat wider at the heads.

Second. The annual report of the Chief of Engineers for the year ending June 30, 1913, shows that the 35-foot channel for this section of Delaware River was on that date about 12½ per cent completed. The estimated cost of this channel is $10,920,000, of which $4,110,000 has been appropriated to date, leaving $6,809,200 yet to be appropriated.

Third. During the past fiscal year approximately $1,000,000 was expended in furthering the work on this project. At this rate 10 years would be required to complete the improvement. The present plans contemplate an expenditure of approximately $2,000,000 a year, which would thus cut the time for prosecuting the work down to five years. As a matter of fact, however, the length of time which will be required to carry this work to completion will depend upon the rate at which appropriations for the work are made by Congress.

Very respectfully,
EDW. BURR,
Colonel, Corps of Engineers, Acting Chief of Engineers.

This letter shows that, so far as the War Department is concerned, the channel of the Delaware River is "legislatively completed at 30 feet for mean water," but the actual channel conditions are probably more accurately described by Representative MOORE, of Philadelphia, one of the best informed men in the House on questions of this kind, in the argument he made before the House Committee on Naval Affairs last year. At that time he made the following statement:

"They have reported that we have 30 feet of water, so far as all legislation and engineering is concerned, for a length of 60 miles. There are creeks and rivers running into the main channel which add to the silt formation. It is a slushy, soft sort of material, and men who navigate the river differ as to the actual bottom depth; but it is a fact that we have more than 28 feet at mean low water, and we have what the Army engineers and shipping men consider an actual 30-foot mean low water depth, including this silt. At this time we are working under the new appropriation on a 35-foot channel, and that work demonstrates that here and there may be a formation of silt which raises the bottom at certain points in this 60-mile length. Vessels drawing more than 28 feet can and do push their way through it, but they take advantage of the tides. The problem is one of dredging and maintenance, and we are now trying to meet it." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., p. 2136.)

The maintenance of the present depth, according to the report of Lieut. Col. Kuhn, "has at all times necessitated careful observation of the channel at all points by survey parties, and the prompt removal of any shoaling on the first indications" (see Rept. U. S. A. Engineers, 1913, p. 1747), and at a total cost of more than $300,000 for the past year, or nearly one-eighth of the total amount expended by the Government on the maintenance and improvement of the Norfolk-Portsmouth Harbor since 1876.

But the depth of the Delaware River, if 30 feet 1 inch at mean low water, is not sufficient for its safe navigation by the present large dreadnaughts, and certainly will not be safe for vessels of larger size and of increased draft. The battleships New York, Texas, Nevada, and Oklahoma "have a mean draft, under normal displacement, of 28 feet 6 inches," and according to the best "expert naval opinion a safe channel should be swept to at least 3 feet below the maximum battleship draft." I have the following letter as my authority for this statement:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 27, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. HOLLAND: Your letter to Rear Admiral Blue, respecting the depth of water that should be under a battleship's keel for safe investigation has been brought to my attention, and I beg to reply as follows:

Expert naval opinion considers that a safe channel should be swept to at least 3 feet below the maximum battleship draft. Thus a battleship drawing 32 feet could safely use a channel with 35 feet of water at mean low water. The extra 3 feet is necessary, because every ship "squats" when proceeding in shallow water, the amount of "squats" or increase in draft depending upon the speed. The General Board of the Navy has recommended a practicable depth of 40 feet in all approaches to navy yards, because a ship drawing 32 feet—the maximum draft of new construction—with her compartments forward flooded, is estimated to increase her draft to 39 feet. By proceeding dead slow, she could use a channel with a known depth of 40 feet. The above figures apply to smooth water. If there is an ocean swell at the entrance to a channel, an additional allowance must be made, and this allowance depends upon local conditions. When strong local offshore winds blow for a considerable time, the depth of water in channels leading to large estuaries, such as Chesapeake Bay, and certain harbors, as New York, is very appreciably decreased.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. E. E. HOLLAND,
House of Representatives.

Would a practical business man, with full knowledge of the condition of the channel approaches to the two stations, build at this time a dry dock capable of accommodating the biggest ships of the Navy, at Philadelphia or at Norfolk?

Second. It is located sufficiently far from the sea to prevent its bombardment by an enemy's fleet, behind ample defenses, independent of the fleet, and with an approach channel that can not be easily obstructed.

The naval board appointed in 1869 to make a report on the conditions of the Norfolk yard, said:

"It is, though near the sea, as inaccessible to attack as if it were far inland, possessing every advantage required for defense by land and by sea, and by its exterior and exterior lines of defense. Its situation is healthy, in a temperate climate, in the sea air, and on a firm, sandy soil."

It has ample defenses independent of the fleet. Large fortifications have been erected by the Government at Fortress Monroe, and these are ample to protect the yard and also to prevent any obstruction of the approach channel. When Cape Henry is fortified, as is now contemplated, it will be the best protected yard on the coast, and can, in the opinion of Army and Navy experts, be easily maintained, even in time of war, as the greatest distributing, equipping, and refitting station of the Navy.

Third. It has good communications, both by rail and water, with manufacturing and supply centers, and is capable of furnishing quickly sufficient coal, fuel, oil, provisions, and other supplies for naval vessels.

Eight great trunk lines, having a trackage of nearly 50,000 miles, and 32 foreign, coastwise, and river lines, operating and reaching out in every direction, connect the Norfolk yard with all the principal material supply depots in the country. Materials of all kinds and of the very best quality used in the construction or repair of ships can be assembled here with great dispatch and at the lowest cost. Such materials, and in such quantities as may be desired, are now assembled at Newport News, located in almost the same harbor, at prices which enable the great shipbuilding plant at that point to successfully compete with all other shipbuilding plants in the country for Government work.

It is now recognized as the great clearing house of the fleet for coal, oil, ammunition, and stores. More than 45 per cent of the coal consumed for naval purposes on the Atlantic coast is delivered to ships and vessels of the fleet from the great terminal coaling points on Hampton Roads. Naval colliers also carry large quantities of this same coal from these same points to the Pacific coast. The kind of coal delivered from these piers is the celebrated Pocohontas coal, long since recognized as the very best steam coal on the market for naval purposes.

Great quantities of ammunition are prepared, assembled, and stored at the naval magazine at St. Juliens, only a few miles from the station. More than 3,000,000 separate pieces of ammunition, including shells, cartridges, and explosives, were delivered from this station to such vessels during the six months ending December 31, 1912.

On the opposite side of the river from the yard are great oil tanks from which vessels can be promptly supplied, and also the St. Helena Training Station, one of the very best, and certainly the least expensive, stations owned by the Government. During the fiscal year ending July 1, 1912, 4,932 men were transferred from this station to seagoing vessels.

I have mentioned these facts to show that this yard, already the Navy's greatest coal, ammunition, and stores supply station, can, by reason of its location and its splendid rail and water transportation facilities, be as easily made one of its greatest material supply depots. I have also mentioned them to show that naval vessels, after they have been docked, repaired, or constructed at this yard, can then be quickly supplied with coal and ammunition, provisioned, and prepared for any cruise or for any service.

Fourth. It is located at a point where climatic conditions are unsurpassed, and where an efficient force of skilled workmen can be secured and maintained at all times.

The climatic conditions of the yard are almost ideal. Its mean temperature is as follows: Spring, 57°; summer, 78°; autumn, 62°; winter, 42°. Severe weather never interferes with its work. Workmen can be comfortable while at work, and are thereby enabled to do better work and in much better time than if compelled to work under different climatic conditions. With a certainty of steady employment, and with a certainty of cheap and comfortable homes, which can easily be had either in Norfolk or Portsmouth, mechanics will be attracted to this yard and an efficient force of workmen can be maintained at all times.

This is best evidenced by the fact that at Newport News, practically within the same harbor, and where climatic conditions are similar, no difficulty has been experienced by the private shipbuilders there in maintaining a sufficient force of skilled mechanics, and at such fair and reasonable wages as to enable them to secure contracts for building great battleships for the Government in competition with all the other great shipbuilders of the country. If such a force of skilled workmen can be secured and maintained at Newport News by private parties, it can hardly be doubted that equally as large a number can be secured and maintained at Norfolk by the Government.

This station, therefore, meets all the requisites for a great naval base, with the single exception that it has not sufficient means for the upkeep and repair of the fleet. Its docking and repair facilities are inadequate. There is an especially urgent demand for additional docking facilities, and for the reasons, briefly stated, as follows:

First. By reason of its geographical location it is visited by a larger number of naval ships and vessels than any other station on the coast.

Naval ships and vessels pass and repass it in going to and returning from all points south of Cape Hatteras. They call at this station for coal, ammunition, stores, and necessary dockings and repairs.

When we examine the sheets issued by the War Department showing the daily movements of vessels for the year 1912 we find, according to a report made by Capt. J. B. Patton, of the Navy, the following:

Arrivals and departures of vessels.

Norfolk Navy Yard	642
Norfolk Harbor, including Hampton Roads	662
Total	1,304
New York Navy Yard	375
New York Harbor, including North River, East River, and Tompkinsville, and including 246 arrivals and departures during naval review, Oct. 12, 1912	437
Total	812
Boston Navy Yard	202
Boston Harbor	1
Total	203
Philadelphia Navy Yard	123
Philadelphia Harbor	0
Total	123

Arrivals and departures, as shown by Movements of Vessels, issued daily by the Navy Department, for the calendar year 1913, are as follows:

Norfolk Navy Yard	564
Norfolk Harbor, including Hampton Roads	828
	1,392
New York Navy Yard	455
New York Harbor, including Tompkinsville, North and East Rivers	142
	597
Boston Navy Yard	179
Philadelphia Navy Yard	138

These figures show that during the years 1912 and 1913 the number of naval ships and vessels at the Norfolk yard for docking, repairs, and other purposes, and in Hampton Roads for coal, ammunition, and stores, was larger than at all the other yards on the Atlantic coast. I have made no examination for the purpose of comparing these figures with the figures for others years, but I am satisfied a close examination will disclose that they are not unusual.

Mr. LEA. I would like to make just a brief statement there. It is pretty hard to answer a statement some time after it has been made, and I would like to answer that statement at this point. I simply want to suggest that two-thirds of the tonnage of the naval rendezvous at New York in October a year ago came from the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

Second. In consequence of the large number of ships that go to this yard the number of necessary dockings is larger than at any other station on the coast.

Hampton Roads is the fleet's rendezvous. Its drill and practice grounds are near the Capes. Its peace cruising is largely done in the West Indies. Ships pass and repass this point in going to and returning from the Panama Canal. It is quite certain, therefore, that the number of ships which will go to this station for docking, repairing, and other purposes, and to Hampton Roads for coal, ammunition, and supplies, will largely increase each year.

For the calendar year 1912, according to a report made by Capt. J. B. Patton to the department, the number of vessels docked at the several yards on the Atlantic coast was as follows:

Norfolk	103
New York	82
Boston	53
Philadelphia	33

"If we credit," says Capt. Patton, "New York with only 3½ docks, because No. 4 Dock was only in use half the year, and Norfolk with 2½ docks, because No. 1 was used exclusively for six months in rebuilding the Warrington, then the activity of the docks at the several yards is indicated by the following figures:

	Vessels.
Norfolk docked per dock per annum	41
Boston docked per dock per annum	26
New York docked per dock per annum	23
Philadelphia docked per dock per annum	16

And this is not an exceptional showing for this yard.

In a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, dated August 22, 1913, I find the following statement:

Data regarding vessels docked during the past year.

	Number of vessels docked.	Days dock in use.
Navy yard, Boston:
Dock 1	32	192
Dock 2	23	175
Total	55
Navy yard, New York:
Dock 1	29	237
Dock 2	18	289
Dock 3	26	202
Dock 4	16	168
Total	89
Navy yard, Philadelphia:

Total	43
Navy yard, Norfolk:
Dock 1	28	234
Dock 2	53	266
Dock 3	63	278
Total	144

This is an exceedingly interesting statement. It shows that we docked at Norfolk last year more than 40 per cent of all the ships docked at all the stations on the Atlantic seaboard. It shows that during the past year as many ships were docked at the Norfolk station as at any two other stations on the coast, considerably more than twice as many as at Boston and considerably more than three times as many as at Philadelphia. It also shows a greater activity of the docks at the Norfolk station than at any other station, each dock at this yard having been in use a greater number of days during the year than any dock at any other yard, with the single exception of Dock No. 2 at the New York yard.

I also submit herewith a statement showing the number of vessels docked at the several yards for the years 1909, 1910, and 1911. This is also an interesting statement. It shows the increasing activity of the docks at the Norfolk yard. Sixty-six vessels were docked here in 1909 and 144 in 1913. At Philadelphia 25 vessels were docked in 1909 and 43 in 1913.

[1]Dry Dock No. 4 was not commissioned until May 9, 1912. First vessel docked Dec. 8, 1906.

If a larger number of vessels are docked per dock per annum at this yard than at any other yard, and if the docks at this yard are used a greater number of days during the year than the docks at the other yards, it would seem to follow that there is a more urgent demand for additional docking facilities at this yard than at any other on the Atlantic coast.

Third. The present docking facilities at the yard are insufficient to meet the needs of the fleet.

This can be established, first, by the testimony of Army and Navy experts, and, second, by the actual physical condition of the docks at the yard.

On page 181 of the hearing before the committee Admiral Stanford, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, made the following statement:

"The present docking facilities are overtaxed. The present docks are insufficient for the docking of vessels that are now assigned to the yard."

The Board of Inspection for Shore Stations, in its recent report, said: "While an additional dry dock would increase the docking facilities at this yard, it would not constitute a reserve, since the present docking facilities are inadequate"

We now have three docks at this station. Dock No. 1 is a small dock and has been in use since 1832. At that time only wooden ships were constructed. Dock No. 2 is a timber dock and was completed in 1889, or 25 years ago. It is already beginning to show signs of weakness and decay. It is necessary to make large annual repairs on it in order to keep it in condition to be used. The life of a timber dock is only 30 years. Referring to this dock, the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, in a letter dated September 16, 1913, says:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of yesterday (the 13th), inquiring as to the present condition of the timber dry dock at Norfolk—Dry Dock No. 2—and how many years it can probably be safely used, the bureau begs to state that this dock was completed in 1889 and has never received any extensive repairs. The average life of a timber dock, without extensive repairs, is generally assumed to be about 30 years, depending largely on local conditions, but this dock has withstood deterioration unusually well and is now in fairly good condition. It is estimated that it is good for 10 years' useful life, with an annual expenditure of about $3,000. This estimate, however, is based upon a superficial examination which, of course, does not disclose the condition of the foundation, piling, and framework, but is thought to be conservative.

Very respectfully,

H. R. STANFORD, Chief of Bureau.

The life of this timber dock is therefore very uncertain. It certainly can not be many years until it becomes unfit for use. It would most probably be condemned before a new dry dock could be completed, even if one should be authorized at this session. Fifty-three vessels were docked in it during the past year. Without this dock many of these dockings, although necessary to maintain the efficiency of the fleet, could not have been had at this station.

Dock No. 3 is the only dock at the yard capable of accommodating the largest ships and is in almost continuous use. If this dock should be damaged or should have to be repaired or should have to be used for many months by one ship undergoing extensive repairs, then the yard could not furnish the docking facilities necessary for the actual needs of the fleet. It is always wise to provide for such contingencies as may reasonably be expected. It is not unreasonable to expect that this dock may have to be repaired or may have to be occupied for a considerable time by a vessel undergoing repairs.

The number of large battleships is increasing. Injuries to ships, necessitating prompt dockings, are liable to occur at any time, and vessels in distress invariably seek this yard. With Hampton Roads used by the fleet as its most frequent base of operations, there is a greater probability of unforeseen dockings at the Norfolk yard than at any other station on the coast. Would it not be the part of prudence to provide ample docking facilities at this section for such contingencies?

There is only one other dock on the Atlantic coast capable of accommodating the biggest ships of the Navy. Would you send these ships there to be docked? Could this station, in addition to the ships assigned to it, take care of the additional dockings required? And if it could, would not the delay and expense of sending ships to that station be considerable and sometimes dangerous?

The fact that docking facilities at this yard are inadequate and that additional facilities are needed is convincingly shown by the circumstances attending the recent arrival there of the disabled battleship Vermont. The battleship Vermont was docked immediately upon its arrival in order that the extent of its damage might be determined. The battleship Delaware, which convoyed the Vermont to Norfolk, was found to need examination. There being only one dock there in which the Delaware could be examined, it was necessary to undock the disabled warship Vermont before any repairs on it had been undertaken and dock the Delaware in order that its condition could be ascertained. In the meantime the New Hampshire and the Louisiana had reached the station, and it was necessary to delay the docking of these warships until the repairs on the Delaware could be completed. Such a condition, liable to occur at any time, not only makes it imperative to provide additional docking facilities at this station, but proves conclusively that the present facilities are inadequate.

With such evidence and such conditions before them, the Army and Navy experts have recommended additional docks for this station, and these recommendations have been approved by the department.

The basic value of any yard is usually measured by its dry-dock possibilities and its dry-dock facilities. Its strategical, commercial, and manufacturing advantages, "as well as its adaptability and capacity for contributing to the endurance and efficiency of the fleet," largely determine its military usefulness. The Joint Army and Navy Board must have been satisfied that its dry-dock possibilities were apparent and could easily be enlarged, and that its advantages made it a station of the greatest military usefulness, or else this board would not have advised Secretary Myer "that the interest of the Nation and of the Navy could be best served by the establishment at Norfolk of a first-class station, fully equipped for docking half the fleet."

The Board of Inspection for Shore Stations, in its recent report, declared "that the most important improvement needed at the Norfolk yard, and the one which should be provided at the earliest possible time, is an additional dry dock of the largest dimensions," and gave as one of the reasons for its conclusion "that this yard is centrally located and more liable to be called upon for unforeseen repairs and unforeseen dockings than any other station on the coast."

Admiral Stanford, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, in the hearing before the committee, page 173, quotes this recommendation of the board in full, and gives it his indorsement.

Admiral Watt, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, on page 260 of the hearings before the committee, stated that "the lower Chesapeake is a natural base, and that a permanent naval base should have ample docking and repair facilities."

Capt. Winterhalter, speaking for the General Board, recently said, in part, as follows:

"Sectionalism does not enter into the consideration for the good of the Navy. The General Board expresses the best thought of the Navy, embodying research and investigation, together with calm deliberation upon the needs of the right arm of the national defense. Its conclusions may be accepted as those of minds ripened by long experience in the service."

A dry dock of 1,700 feet is necessarily long and unnecessarily expensive. But in order to place Philadelphia in its proper strategical position with regard to the dry-dock question, I requested the General Board, on last Tuesday, for its opinion as to the relative order of importance of location of the next needed large docks. This is it:

"The provision of a new dry dock at Philadelphia should wait upon the provision of the new dry docks at Guantanamo, Norfolk, and New York, in that order of importance, unless the appropriations can be obtained for simultaneous building. That is the Atlantic dry-dock solution—the Navy needs—brought up to date. (See Philadelphia Inquirer, Dec. 20, 1913.)"

Admiral Stanford, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, on page 184 of the hearings, after quoting the recommendation of the general board as to dry docks, said:

"The recommendation for the Norfolk dock has been repeatedly urged for the past four years."

Could expert evidence in favor of the location of the new dry dock at Norfolk be stronger? It is not the opinion of a single board, but the general consensus of opinion of all the Army and Navy experts who have for years calmly deliberated upon the needs of the Navy, the unbiased conclusion of men whose minds have been ripened by years of experience in the service. Such recommendations had, and ought to have had, strong weight with the Secretary of the Navy. Convinced that he ought to approve them, he did not hesitate to do his duty and to recommend that an immediate appropriation be made with which to begin the construction of the proposed dock. Supported by the best judgment of the Army and Navy experts from every section of the country, he need not be disturbed because of some unjust criticism of his course. I sincerely hope that this committee will adopt his recommendation and will make the appropriation asked for.

I have heard only three objections to the location of the proposed dock at Norfolk.

The first objection is that the channel conditions of the river in front of the yard at Norfolk are not satisfactory.

It is true that these conditions are not entirely satisfactory, and ought to have been improved years ago. Under a project adopted March 2, 1907, a dredged channel 30 feet deep, 600 feet wide from Hampton Roads to Lamberts Point, 800 feet from Lamberts Point to the navy yard, and from 470 to 700 feet in the Southern Branch of the Elizabeth River, was provided for.

By the act of June 25, 1910, the dredging of the channel 35 feet deep and 400 feet wide at mean low water from deep water in Hampton Roads to the Belt Line Bridge above the navy yard, a distance of 11 miles, was authorized. Both of these projects have since been completed, and, in addition, the channel conditions have been improved by dredging authorized from time to time by the Navy Department.

The depth of the dredged channel in front of the navy yard is now 35 feet and from 470 to 700 feet wide, varying according to the pierhead lines on the opposite side of the river. In front of Dry Dock No. 3 this channel is now about 600 feet wide.

Mr. KELLY. How long are the longest battleships?

The CHAIRMAN. I think the longest is five hundred and some odd feet.

Mr. KELLY. How wide is the river in front of the yard?

Mr. HOLLAND. In front of Dry Dock No. 3 this channel is now about 600 feet wide.

This is best evidenced by the fact that two of the Navy's largest battleships, the Texas, 565 feet long, and the Wyoming, 568 feet long, were recently successfully docked at this station. Steps are now being taken, however, to improve these channel conditions. An appropriation has already been made for the purpose of acquiring, by purchase or condemnation, land on the opposite side of the river at the narrowest point. No agreement could be reached between the Government and the owners on the price to be paid therefor, and, in consequence, proceedings have been instituted for the purpose of acquiring this land by condemnation. These proceedings will shortly be terminated, and, before the completion of the proposed dock, if authorized at this session, the maximum width of channel required for all naval needs can and will be secured, and at a cost not exceeding the appropriation already made therefor. In addition to the improvements already authorized, it is confidently expected that a project providing for a channel 35 feet deep and 600 feet wide, recommended in a recent report and approved by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, will be adopted at this session of Congress. When all these improvements are completed, there will be a dredged channel 750 feet wide and 35 feet deep and an available width fronting Dry Dock No. 3 of at least 850 feet. And my information is that if the proposed new dry dock is located, as suggested by Admiral Stanford, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, there will be in front of this dock an available channel width of at least 1,500 feet. These channel conditions are not, therefore, as grave as some people would have you believe. They can be easily improved, within a reasonably short time, and at a price less than the cost of maintaining the channel in the Delaware River for one year. The fact is, that the channel, without any improvements, is now deep enough to permit the biggest battleships to reach the yard, and, when the authorized improvements are completed, will be wide enough to permit the largest ships now contemplated to be docked there without the slightest difficulty or danger. This objection, therefore, is a mere pretext for opposing, and not a real objection to, the proposed improvement.

The second objection is that the location of the proposed dock is a short distance from the present yard shops.

This is true, but a casual inspection of the yard and a careful study of the location, character, and condition of the buildings will convince any impartial person that this objection is not entitled to serious weight. The present facilities at the yard for economical work, as well as the necessary conveniences for such work, are not such as will be found at any modern shipbuilding plant. Admiral Stanford, in the hearing before the committee, page 173, made the following statement:

"The present yard structures are poorly arranged and poorly designed for the demands which are being made upon them. When this yard was first built they were building wooden ships, and the shops were designed for the building of light-draft wooden vessels."

In the recent report of the Edwards Board I find the following:

"The Norfolk yard, being one of the oldest in the country, contains many old buildings, of a design and construction which, judged from modern industrial needs, are neither adaptable for storehouses nor for manufacturing purposes. While they were undoubtedly of excellent construction for the period in which designed, and have served the purpose for which built, some are now showing signs of weakness and the lives of all can not probably be greatly prolonged. It would undoubtedly promote both economy and efficiency to give consideration to the question of erecting new buildings in preference to attempting any important improvement or extension of buildings which were designed for conditions that no longer exist, and which can not possibly again prevail."

These statements are convincing that new buildings and new machinery must be provided if the yard is to be successfully operated even as a repair station.

A practical business man always strives to secure for his plant every convenience that will enable him to perform his work in the most economical manner. If he finds some of his buildings are inconveniently located, he immediately takes steps to rebuild them on more convenient locations, and if his machinery by reason of age or otherwise will not render efficient service he immediately replaces it with more modern machinery. If the Government wishes to secure satisfactory and economical work, it must pursue the same course that an ordinarily prudent business man would follow. This course may necessitate the abandonment of some old buildings and the purchase of some new machinery, but it will be real economy to take this step rather than to continue to use buildings designed for the handling of "light-draft wooden vessels" and machinery, some of which was purchased before the Civil War and ought to have been condemned years ago. If these new improvements are placed upon the undeveloped tract of land now owned by the Government, and the only logical development of the yard is in that direction, then by the time the new dock is completed this apparent objection will have been entirely removed.

But Philadelphia ought not to raise this objection to the location of the proposed dock at Norfolk.

The appropriations for the Philadelphia yard from 1883, when a naval board recommended that it should be closed unless it could be improved for the purposes for which originally purchased, to 1914, inclusive, have amounted to $9,616,319.21. During the same period the appropriations for the Norfolk yard have amounted to $8,286,958.23, or $1,329,361 less than the appropriations for the Philadelphia yard. My authority for this statement is a letter from the Paymaster General of the Navy, which is submitted herewith:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 17, 1914.

Hon. E. E. HOLLAND, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Complying with your request on the 13th instant, I take pleasure in inclosing herewith a statement showing the aggregate amount of the appropriations for the Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk Navy Yards for the years 1883 to 1914, inclusive.

Very respectfully,

T. J. COWIE,
Paymaster General United States Navy.

Boston	$7,218,360.00
New York	12,533,561.47
Philadelphia	9,616,319.21
Norfolk	8,286,958.23

The two docks built at Norfolk within that period have cost $2,233,945, and the two docks built at Philadelphia have cost $2,020,250, or a difference of $213,695. (See Navy Yearbook, 1913, p. 854.)

Mr. LEE. I wish to state at this point that I showed to the naval expert, Capt. Winterhalter, that instead of a dry dock at Norfolk costing less than a dry dock at Philadelphia, that the dry dock at Philadelphia cost $557,000 less than the dry dock at Norfolk, and I hope the gentleman will correct his figures in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. He makes his own statement, and your brief is in the record. The two statements will be there for the committee to consider.

Mr. LEE. Capt. Winterhalter showed that he did not know that the power plant at Philadelphia was included in the dry dock.

The CHAIRMAN. Those are questions of fact for the committee to consider.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. That does not render the other statement incompetent at all.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. HOLLAND. According to these figures, Philadelphia has expended on its buildings and improvements, exclusive of its dry docks, $1,543,056 more than Norfolk has expended during the same period, leaving out of consideration the facts that out of Norfolk's appropriations the St. Helena Training Station has been largely built and 272 acres of additional land purchased, at a cost of $400,000, and added to the original yard. But after all, the location of this dock has not yet been selected, and when selected it may be found that it will be so close to the present yard shops that it will not be necessary to erect many new buildings.

But why should Philadelphia urge this objection? Any experienced employee at any navy yard will tell you that the one shop that ought to be near a dry dock is the machine shop. If the dock should be located at Philadelphia so as to connect the river and the basin—and this is urged as the main argument for its location there—it will be 1,400 feet, or more than a quarter of a mile from the machine shop. The relation, therefore, between shops and dry dock would not be ideal even at Philadelphia. (See Stanford hearing, p. 186.)

The third objection is that the dry dock can not be as economically constructed at Norfolk as it can be at Philadelphia.

It seems to me that the question of cost is one of secondary importance. A new dry dock ought to be constructed at the place where it is actually needed, and not where it can be most cheaply constructed. It ought to be placed at a station where it can be reached by the biggest battleships, so that the present efficiency of the Navy may be promoted. But would it cost more to build this dock at Norfolk? There is no reason why the work can not be done there just as cheaply as elsewhere, and in this opinion Admiral Watt, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, concurs. On page 261 of the hearings he makes the following statement:

"There are no reasons known why a dry dock can not be constructed there as cheaply as at other stations."

It is not necessary, however, to rely upon mere estimates of cost. Dry docks have been built at the two stations within recent years, and the figures showing the actual cost of these docks have been easily secured. Dry Dock No. 2 at Philadelphia cost $1,471,550. Dry dock No. 3 at Norfolk originally cost $1,200,000. It was subsequently extended, and, with the extension, it cost, fully completed, $1,728,965, or $257,415 more than the Philadelphia dock. (See Navy Year Book, 1913, p. 845.)

A letter submitted herewith gives the cost and size of each dock:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 17, 1914.

Hon. E. E. HOLLAND, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Subject: Information regarding dry docks at Philadelphia and Norfolk Navy Yards.

Reference: Your letter of January 13, 1914, to the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

MY DEAR MR. HOLLAND: Referring to your letter above mentioned, the following information is furnished in regard to the dry docks at Philadelphia and Norfolk:

	Philadelphia, No. 2.	Norfolk, No. 3, including extension.
Length	744 feet 6⅞ inches	722 feet 11 inches.
Depth, mean high water, to top of keel blocks.	29 feet 10½ inches	31 feet ½ inch.
Width, 6 feet above sill	91 feet 10 inches	101 feet.
Cost	$1,471,550.57	$1,728,965.93.

The Norfolk Dock was extended in 1910 by the addition of 182 feet at a cost of $528,965.93, which is included in the total cost given above.

The depth and width of the entrance of the Philadelphia Dock are less than the Norfolk Dock.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

You will note that the dock at Philadelphia is a little longer than the dock at Norfolk, but the Norfolk Dock is deeper, has a wider entrance and, according to the testimony of the experts, can now accommodate the biggest ships of the Navy, while the Philadelphia Dock, according to the same experts, is not big enough to do so. It must also be remembered in this connection that the removal of the end of the original dock, in order to extend it, added materially to its final cost and may entirely account for the difference in the cost of the two docks. Conditions at the two yards are the same now as then, and the only sensible conclusion is that the relative cost of dock construction at the two yards can not be materially different. And this statement is sustained by the following letter from Admiral Stanford, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
September 13, 1913.

Hon. E. E. HOLLAND, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HOLLAND: The following information regarding certain conditions at the Norfolk Navy Yard is submitted in compliance with your request of December 11:

The present width of channel in front of the navy yard is now about 500 feet. An appropriation has been made for acquiring property on the other side of the river opposite the entrance to the largest dry dock, No. 3, and widening the river by dredging to give a channel 700 feet wide in this vicinity.

In the construction and extension of Dry Dock No. 3, the latest and largest one at Norfolk, no special difficulties were encountered in the foundation. So far as can be determined in advance of complete borings or test pits, similar conditions are anticipated on the site of the proposed Dry Dock No. 4.

As regards the relative cost of dry-dock construction at Norfolk and Philadelphia, the principal features of the work affected would be the cofferdam, work of excavation, cost of common labor, and cost of materials required in concrete. It is not probable that the cost of the cofferdam work would be radically different at the two stations. The cost of excavation would probably be slightly less at Norfolk than at Philadelphia, because of the softer character of material to be handled. It is not practicable to make a reliable estimate of the amount of this difference without first making numerous borings, which would not be warranted until after the work of construction had been authorized. The cost of labor would probably be less at Norfolk than at Philadelphia, and this advantage would probably be somewhat increased due to the less rigorous climate at Norfolk.

It is not improbable that the cost of concrete at Philadelphia would be from $150,000 to $200,000 less than at Norfolk, as result of the favorable deposits of sand and gravel which are found at Philadelphia, and which would have to be removed incident to the excavation of the dock.

Very respectfully.

H. R. STANFORD, Chief of Bureau.

Now, if the principal items of dock construction will be, as stated in this letter, the cofferdam work, work of excavation, common labor, and the materials required in concrete, and if the cost of cofferdam work will not be different at the two stations, the cost of excavation and of common labor less at Norfolk, and the cost of materials required in concrete only from $150,000 to $200,000 less at Philadelphia, how is it possible to figure that a 1,700-foot dry dock can be built at Philadelphia at the same price at which our 1,000-foot dock can be built at Norfolk? The fact is, the dry dock at Norfolk, if located as suggested by Admiral Stanford, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, will cost, according to his estimate, only $2,350,000, while the 1,700-foot dry dock at Philadelphia, as stated by Representative MOORE in his argument before the Committee on Naval Affairs last year, would, in the opinion of Admiral Hollyday, cost in excess of $4,000,000. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2138.)

But some one has suggested that the relative cost of construction at the two yards might be materially different on account of greater difficulty in securing a solid foundation for the dock at Norfolk. Absolutely no difficulty has been encountered in the past with foundations of dry docks and other structures at this station, and there is not the slightest apprehension of any such difficulty in the future. Marl exists at depths varying from 50 to 150 feet below the surface throughout the area of this yard, and in the case of Dock No. 3 at this station this foundation of marl was of such excellent character as to eliminate entirely all need for foundation piles. The following letter from Admiral N. R. Usher, commandant, explains the subsoil conditions at this yard:

"Results of exploratory borings and experience with foundations of dry docks and other structures in the yard proper and at the Marine barracks, together with knowledge of the experience of others with foundations in this immediate vicinity, all lead to the conviction that subsoil conditions greatly favor the economical construction of a dry dock on the Schmoele tract. As a matter of fact, it is well known that marl exists at depths varying from 50 to 150 feet below the surface throughout the area of this tract. There is nothing whatever indicating the possibility of encountering variations in the subsoil conditions which would warrant the selection of one site over another within the limits of the Government property at this station."

And the statements made in this letter are sustained by the testimony of Admiral Stanford and of Admiral Watt in the hearings before the committee (p. 1783).

But there is one objection that has not been urged against the location of the dock at Norfolk, and that is the cost of widening and deepening the channel to the navy yard. The appropriations for the improvement of harbor conditions at Philadelphia, and in order to secure a depth of 30 feet in the Delaware River, have amounted to $19,217,864.51. (See Report of Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army, 1913, p. 1749.) The estimated cost of the present 35-foot project for that river is $10,920,000. The appropriations for improving the harbor at Norfolk-Portsmouth, and in order to secure a channel 600 feet wide and 30 feet deep and a channel 400 feet wide and 35 feet deep, have amounted to $2,625,458.84. The estimated cost of the present project for a channel 600 feet wide and 35 feet deep is $840,000. The estimated cost of maintenance of the Delaware River channel is $300,000 per year, and of the Elizabeth River channel $15,000. It will cost less than $1,840,000 to give us a channel 600 feet wide and 35 feet deep from deep water in Hampton Roads to above the navy yard. Substantially the same channel in the Delaware River will cost $10,920,000.

I have mentioned these facts not because I object to the improvement of the Delaware River, but in order to show you that a channel of greater depth than 35 feet, if desired by the Navy Department, can be secured for the Norfolk yard at very much less cost than for the Philadelphia yard. And when such depth is secured it can be more cheaply maintained in the Elizabeth River than in the Delaware River.

"There is," says the Edwards Board, "a tendency on the Schuylkill and Delaware River sides of the yard to deposit silt about the piers and in slack water, which gradually reduces the depths in some places at the rate of about 2 feet per year. (See Edwards Board Reports, p. 16.)"

No such conditions prevail at the Norfolk yard.

There is still another objection that can not be made against the location of the dock at Norfolk, and that is that a dock, if located at Norfolk, would have to be 1,700 feet long. Representative MOORE, of Philadelphia, made an argument before your committee last year in favor of the location of such a dock at Philadelphia, but in his argument he was frank enough to say "that nobody ever heard of a dry dock 1,700 feet long, and that there is certainly nothing of the kind anywhere in the known world." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., p. 2137.)

Capt. Winterhalter, speaking for the General Board, on the 20th of December last, made the following statement:

"The General Board has never asked for so large a dry dock anywhere. The Panama Canal locks are 1,000 feet long, 110 feet wide, and 40 feet deep, and docks of this size are our present limit. A dock of 1,700 feet is, therefore, unnecessarily long and unnecessarily expensive."

Ex-Secretary of the Navy Meyer, in a letter which I have, and which anyone of you may read, referring to the 1,700-foot dry dock, said:

"Personally, I have never recommended it."

Secretary of the Navy Daniels has repeatedly declared:

"We have no need for a dock of this size."

Admiral Stanford, in his hearing before the committee, made the following statement:

"The reason that a dry dock 1,700 feet long was recommended is not because a dry dock having a length of 1,700 feet is a military necessity, but because it is 1,700 feet between the basin and the Delaware River, and the dock was to have sufficient length to connect the two bodies of water." (See hearing, p. 160.)

It is very generally assumed that the size of future battleships will be limited to the size of the Panama Canal locks. What, then, is the necessity for a dock 1,700 feet long? Will you authorize a dock of such length when the General Board of the Navy declares that we do not need it now and may never need it?

"It is," said Admiral Stanford, "the facility that is most necessary to secure the successful use of the reserve basin." (See hearing, p. 157.) reserve basin." (See hearing, p. 157.)

Must we build this dock to secure the successful use of the basin? Can it be true that this basin, urged as one of the arguments in favor of the dock at Philadelphia, is so inaccessible that vessels going into it from the Schuylkill River, "on account of the tides, the narrow and tortuous channel" (see hearing, p. 158), and the "shifting or shoaling of the river bottom" (see hearing, p. 157), require very careful handling? In order to reach it safely are the services of a skillful pilot essential? But do we build docks for the purpose of improving such conditions? The Board for Shore Stations, on page 16 of its report, declares that it "considers that the present access to the reserve basin should be improved by dredging the main channel of the river." This is the usual way of remedying such conditions. Are you going to authorize a departure from the usual custom in this case? Will the danger of some obstruction in the Schuylkill River justify you in doing it? The Edwards Board, on page 16 of its recent report, declares that "there are also places in the main channel of the Delaware River below Philadelphia where accidental or intentional wrecks would temporarily block access to the sea as effectively as obstructions in the Schuylkill."

How are you going to provide against these obstructions? We need the docks at Norfolk, not for the purpose of improving such conditions as these, but in order that we may have facilities for docking the ships of the Navy.

In conclusion permit me to say that Norfolk's claims to the present dock, whether viewed from the standpoint of strategy, economy, accessibility, or naval necessity, can not be successfully disputed. I have said Norfolk's claims, but if you will permit me to change it I will say the Navy need; for no dock ought to be built at any station unless some naval necessity demands it. Our ablest, our most experienced, our most trusted naval experts, of every rank and from every section of the country, after more than four years' careful study of and calm deliberation upon the needs of the Navy, have declared in the strongest terms that the next large dock ought to be built at Norfolk, and that no dock longer than the Panama Canal locks is necessary or needed. That decision, reached after such careful study and deliberation, by men who are absolutely free from all local influences and all local prejudices and whose only object is to do what may be best for the Navy and for their country, is not only entitled to great weight, but ought to be decisive.

"As at present constituted, and not speaking for myself," said Admiral Dewey, "the General Board of the Navy is an organization that is made up of men whose training, experience, proven ability, and judgment on naval affairs entitle them to the confidence of the American people." (The Navy, February issue.)

We constantly seek their opinion and absolutely rely on their judgment in other matters. If we refuse to be guided by them now and do what they declare is not necessary or needed, we may subject ourselves to the criticism of having neglected our duty or of having permitted considerations other than the good of the Navy to influence our action.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have been forced to make this argument. Philadelphia and Norfolk ought to be fighting together and not against each other. Each city has a great navy yard. The business relations between the people of the two cities have been pleasant and intimate, and nothing ought to be done to disturb them.

I thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Chairman.

GIFT OF SENATE TO MRS. ELEANOR WILSON M'ADOO.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have a letter here from Mrs. McAdoo which concerns the Senate. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

CORNISH, N. H., May 9, 1914.

DEAR SENATOR MARTINE: The perfectly charming bracelet which you and your colleagues in the Senate sent me on my wedding day gave me infinite pleasure, and the generous sentiment that inspired the beautiful gift gave me, if possible, more pleasure than the gift itself.

It will always remind me of the wonderful period through which we are now passing and of my association, indirectly, with the great men in and out of the Senate who are making the history of to-day.

Will you not kindly express to the Members of the Senate my very deep appreciation and grateful thanks, and believe me,

Very sincerely, yours,

ELEANOR WILSON MCADOO.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, yesterday I gave notice that on Friday I should address the Senate on the Panama Canal tolls question.

At the time I was not aware that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] had given notice for that day. So I desire to change the date to Tuesday next following the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that, with the permission of the Senate, on Thursday, the 21st day of May, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall make some further remarks regarding the Panama Canal tolls.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

On May 8, 1914:

S. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution authorizing the Vocational Education Commission to employ such stenographic and clerical assistants as may be necessary, etc.

On May 13, 1914:

S. J. Res. 145. Joint resolution authorizing the President to detail Lieut. Frederick Mears to service in connection with proposed Alaskan railroad.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5890. An act for the relief of settlers within the limits of the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge & Vicksburg Railroad Co. was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 14385, the unfinished business, be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this is the most extraordinary bill ever seriously considered by the United States Congress, for it affects the sovereignty of our Nation. Our forefathers fought long years for their independence and the right to manage their own affairs. But we are asked in this measure to surrender control of our own territory and management of our own canal and relinquish a most important means of defense in case of attack by a foreign country. For hundreds of years a canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans was discussed and various efforts made to bring it about. We made a treaty with Great Britain with that end in view, but the exact location of the canal or how it was to be constructed was not involved in that treaty. It was assumed that the canal would be built by private parties, as in the case of the Suez Canal, and the treaty provided for its neutrality and defense. Nothing was accomplished under that treaty.

The French undertook to construct a canal across the Isthmus, and expended some $300,000,000 for that purpose. They failed, and we undertook to build one ourselves. The old treaty with Great Britain was canceled and another one entered into. At the time that was done it was the expectation that the canal would be constructed on foreign territory. But we became the owners of the land on which the canal now runs, and have built it with our own money without aid of any kind from any other nation. We have expended about $400,000,000, or will have done so, in behalf of the canal by the time it is opened. After having incurred this enormous expense, and redeemed the territory through which the canal runs from its reputation for unhealthfulness, and made it one of the most salubrious parts of the tropical world in which to live, we are now asked to surrender all exclusive rights in the canal. We can not use it for any purpose whatever, except on terms which must be allowed to every other nation that may observe our rules.

During the War with Spain it became necessary to bring the battleship Oregon from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast. That could only be done by sending the vessel around South America, through the Straits of Magellan. It was an anxious moment for our people, and it greatly strengthened the resolve of this country to build a canal across the Isthmus, so as to avoid such risk and delay in the future. But now that we have the canal nearly complete, the President of the United States asks us to legislate in such a way as to recognize the validity of the claim of Great Britain that we can not pass our war vessels or any other vessels through the canal without the payment of tolls.

But that is not all. Under this British contention, if we should, for instance, become engaged in a war with Japan or any other nation we would have to pass one or more war vessels of that nation through the canal, and then could not pass one or more of our own vessels to follow such foreign vessels until a period of 24 hours had elapsed. That would enable a foreign fleet to come through and attack any of our coast cities before our vessels, if in the Pacific Ocean, could reach them. Moreover, we would not be able to shelter any of our war vessels or other vessels within the canal region or within 3 leagues of the entrance of the canal. Hence, all of this supposed gain in doubling the strength of our Navy in case of war would be lost to us. In fact, our $400,000,000 of expenditures for the canal, to say nothing of our interest in it in other ways, would be as much for the benefit of an enemy attacking this country as for our own good. That is all involved in the British contention as to the effect of the treaty in regard to the canal. But in her magnanimity Great Britain concedes us possible belligerent rights, and, strange to say, the President of the United States takes the British view of the case and asks Congress to legislate to carry it into effect.

That is only one feature of the injurious effect of this extraordinary measure which the President has asked Congress to pass. This country has always provided for free waterways to our own people. The ordinance of 1787 makes such provision. An act passed in 1805 creating the territorial government of Orleans also contains such a provision, as did the act admitting Louisiana as a State. The act passed in 1812 for the government of the Territory of Missouri also contained such a provision. The river and harbor act of 1884 provided that vessels of all kinds engaged in domestic commerce on our canals, rivers, and lakes should be free from the payment of tolls. Our Government has expended or appropriated over $700,000,000 for rivers and harbors, canals, and so forth, exclusive of the Panama Canal, for the use of our people without payment of tolls. It is supremely ridiculous to assume that we would have undertaken to spend $400,000,000 on the Panama Canal and at the same time have agreed that this country should not have a single advantage in that canal over any other nation. The proposition is so fantastic as to be beyond belief. And yet that is the contention of the President, and the majority of the Democrats of this Senate are going to support him in his reversed position on this question, notwithstanding it is less than two years since they voted for the law that is now under consideration for repeal.

If this had been his view from the beginning, and the people had known it when he was a candidate for the Presidency, his election, in my opinion, would have been utterly impossible. But he supported, during that canvass, the bill passed by Congress exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls in the Panama Canal. In his speech delivered to farmers in New Jersey in August, 1912, in which he deplored the nonexistence of an American merchant marine in the foreign trade and directed attention to the Panama Canal, which, he said, would allow agricultural products to be shipped from one coast to the other in coastwise vessels, he referred to the act passed by Congress exempting coastwise vessels from tolls in the Panama Canal as follows:

We are digging a tremendous ditch across the Isthmus of Panama. What interest have you in opening it to the ships of the world? We do not own the ships of the world. By a very ingenious process, which I would not keep you standing in the hot sun long enough to outline, the legislation of the United States has destroyed the merchant marine of the United States. One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports; to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast to South America. Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills passed yesterday by the Senate, as it had passed the House, provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. Everything that is done in the interest of free transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men. So that you ought not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of old and new waterways.

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

Now, what was this Democratic platform which the President said was not molasses to catch flies?

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in the coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal.

That was the plank in the platform to which Mr. Wilson referred in his speech, and which he approved and which he accepted, and on which he ran for President. No word of criticism was passed on that plank in the platform. The national Progressive Party in its platform adopted at Chicago in the same year declared:

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit * * * and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

That was the platform on which Mr. Roosevelt ran for President in 1912. The Republican platform in that year made no declaration on the subject, but President Taft signed the bill which provided for free tolls for coastwise shipping, and he filed with the bill a "memorandum" expressing his approval in a strong and forceful manner. Thus all the candidates of the three leading parties in 1912 approved the act of Congress providing for the free passage of coastwise shipping through the canal, and over 13,000,000 voters approved the exemption from tolls of such shipping. Mr. Roosevelt, who was the candidate of the National Progressive Party, in an article published in 1913, said:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are—and I hope and believe will always remain—on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea with reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

President Wilson came before Congress to ask the repeal of the law which he had given his approval and which his party had approved and on the approval of which policy he asked for the votes of the people. He submitted no facts for asking us to reverse ourselves in this extraordinary way. He said that, in his judgment, it was—a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is moreover a plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

That is the only reason given for asking Congress to reverse itself. The President now repudiates his party platform and asks all of us to repudiate our platforms on the subject. And the only reason offered is that he thinks it ought to be done. There have been intimations that the provision in the Democratic platform in regard to free tolls was not understood by the people in 1912. It is hard to deal patiently with such an amazing declaration. Senator MARTINE of New Jersey, in a speech in this body on January 22, 1913, said:

This is not a question of the peace of the world nor of the honor of the American Nation, but it is a question of right and justice to the American people. I favor free tolls for American craft, both ocean and coastwise, and desire that the tolls for all other vessels of the world be only sufficient to maintain the physical condition of the canal, and that the cost and interest thereon shall be America's contribution to the world. I believe that such a policy on the part of this Government with reference to the Panama Canal would rehabilitate our merchant marine, and that in a few years we would command the carrying trade of this hemisphere.

Mr. MARTINE has declared that the provision of his party platform in regard to free tolls for coastwise shipping "was spoken from many, many platforms in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and with a good deal of vehemence." That is a fair answer to the talk that the people were unaware in 1912 of the platform declarations on this subject, although President Wilson, who was then a candidate himself, spoke in approval of the party platform.

It is wonderful what changes of opinion have taken place in such a short time in both the mind of the President and of his Secretary of State. While the President is now intimating that this question was little understood in the canvass of 1912, yet in his speech of acceptance he said:

We are not building a canal and pouring out millions upon millions of money upon its construction merely to establish a water connection between the two coasts of the continent, important and desirable as that may be, particularly from the point of view of naval defense. It would be a little ridiculous if we should build it and then have no ships to send through it. We would not be putting a new canal at our own very doors merely for the use of our men of war. We must build and buy ships in competition with the world. We can do it if we will but give ourselves leave.

But, if the President's contention at the present time is correct, the canal will not help us in any way to build up our shipping. If every other nation has the same advantage in the canal that the United States has the situation will not be changed in the least from what it is at present. And if our coastwise shipping has to pay tolls such vessels will suffer also, because they can not compete with the subsidized ships of Canada, owned by railroad corporations. Other nations are now paying $46,907,220 yearly as subsidies. They also pay the canal tolls on the Suez Canal by reimbursing their shipping for such payments. The Canadian lines receive subsidies and their vessels can be constructed in foreign shipyards much cheaper than we can construct similar ships in this country, because of the higher wages paid here. There is no ground for any difference of opinion on the subject of wages in this country and in Europe or Asia. Records of foreign nations as well as our own inquiries have established the fact beyond question that wages are about two and one-third times higher here than in England, according to the report of the investigators sent to this country by the British Government, and the difference is vastly greater when compared with Japan and other countries. All those countries have lower wages, lower cost of construction, cheaper rates for money, and then their Governments subsidize their vessels in addition.

Mr. President, the truth is, if this bill becomes a law, the United States will be discriminated against. In this connection I call attention to an editorial in the Washington Post of May 7, 1914, as follows:

WHY DISCRIMINATE AGAINST THE UNITED STATES?

The United States, as owner of the Panama Canal, and the territory through which it extends, stands in a different position toward the canal than any other nation, and it can not place itself in the same position as nonowning nations.

Can the United States pay tolls to itself for the passage of its own battleships through the canal? Can it exclude its own warships from the canal for failure to pay tolls? Can it take steps to violate the neutrality of the canal by blowing up one of the locks, and at the same time punish itself for such an act? If any belligerent's vessels disembark war materials or troops in the canal, all the ships of such a nation can be excluded from the canal. Can the United States exclude itself from the canal, if it should become a belligerent and find it necessary to land troops in the canal?

Those who try to place the United States in the same category with other nations with respect to the Panama Canal are lost in a maze of absurdities.

As owner of the canal, the United States owns the use of the canal. Ownership without use is not full ownership. The right to use the canal in perpetuity has already been paid for by the United States. It should not pay again in the shape of tolls. If its coastwise shipping is required to pay tolls, the United States will be grossly discriminated against. It will be the only nation in the world using the canal which is required to pay twice over for its use.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides for equal treatment of all nations using the canal and respecting the rules. This equality goes into the spirit of fairness, and is not a mere technicality, to be violated in spirit and obeyed in letter. The equality provided for is described as being "no discrimination against any such nation."

If the United States is one of "such nations," it has a right to receive equality of treatment. It is morally bound to treat itself exactly as it treats other nations. How can it do this if it buys and pays for the use of the canal for itself and then imposes another tax upon its shipping? No other nation has done this. No other nation has to pay more than tolls.

The obligation to enforce the neutrality of the canal rests upon the United States alone. No other nation is bound to respect the neutrality of the canal. If a German fleet should be on the Pacific side and it should attempt to pass through the canal for the purpose of destroying a British squadron in the Atlantic, or seizing Jamaica, Great Britain would not be bound to respect the sanctity of the canal as a world's highway. It would be free to blow up the canal, and only the strong arm of the United States would prevent such a move. The only penalty that could be imposed against Great Britain for an attempt to blow up the canal would be the denial of the right to use the canal.

The United States occupies a unique position among the nations with regard to the canal. It can not impose rules upon itself which it can impose upon other nations, for the simple reason that it is the enforcer of the rules.

The United States owns a line of ships running from New York to Colon. It may extend this line through the canal, which these ships have helped to construct. According to the advocates of free-tolls repeal, these ships would have to pay tolls, just as battleships would have to pay. In fact, Col. Goethals has no right to send a vessel of the Panama Railroad through the canal, loaded with a cargo, without paying tolls if the contention of the repeal advocates is correct. This absurd conclusion is not reached even by Great Britain herself in her demand for "equal treatment" of British shipping.

Great Britain admits that American coastwise shipping is entitled to pass through the canal without tolls so long as the shipping is confined to the coastwise trade and so long as British shipping is not taxed extra to make up for the amount that would be paid by our own shipping.

Both of the conditions imposed by Great Britain have been complied with. There is no attempt to exempt anything but bona fide coastwise shipping, and British ships are not required to pay extra tolls to make up the amount remitted to our shipping. There is therefore no violation of the spirit or the letter of the treaty. As Senator STONE has pointed out, Great Britain has made no protest since Congress passed the tolls exemption law. The protest comes solely from persons who confuse the relation which the United States bears to the canal, and who assume that foreign shipping will be taxed more than its just share.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, an eminent Democratic leader whose word will not be questioned by his party, in speaking on this subject, said:

The subsidies and discrimination that European Governments have given to their shipping interests have practically driven American ships from the sea. American ships carried only $280,206,464, or 8.7 per cent of the total sea-borne commerce of this country for 1911, the total of which was $3,210,642,970. We paid foreigners for freight about $135,000,000.

That is an understatement of the sum we pay for carrying our freight in foreign ships. There is very good authority for stating that it is over $200,000,000. Only as far back as 1870 this country carried 35 per cent of its total imports and exports, while now it has declined to something over 8 per cent. That is due to the great difference in the cost of operating American ships as compared with foreign under the requirements of our laws and the higher wages paid in this country. An official investigation showed that the wage and salary cost per gross ton on the American steamship St. Louis was 97 cents, as compared with 57 cents on the British steamship Oceanic and 54 cents on the German steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The United States paid in 1911 to American ships for carrying the mails $1,074,945, while it paid to foreign ships for the same purpose twice as much, or $2,129,654. Great Britain pays in bounties and subsidies $9,700,000 annually. France paid at the date of the latest returns available $13,425,000, and Japan $6,183,000. All the foreign Governments pay over $46,000,000 a year in subsidies. Great Britain pays the Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. direct subsidies of $1,485,000 annually, nearly enough to pay all its Suez Canal tolls. Germany meets those of the North German Lloyd Co. in a similar manner by the payment of $1,385,000. France paid three French lines two and one-half times as much as their tolls amounted to.

Russia pays the tolls on her ships going through the Suez Canal, and has already made an appropriation to pay the Panama Canal tolls, and Spain has done the same thing. Other nations will pay the Panama tolls in the same way as they have done at Suez. Germany gives favored railroad rates on exports, and combines them with steamship rates, so that it is difficult to tell the amount of the discrimination; but it gives her exports an immense advantage in the way of transportation rates. American railroads give lower rates on imports than they charge on domestic traffic. The particulars as to such rates have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Any burden placed upon interstate commerce at the canal destroys to that extent its usefulness as a competitor of the transcontinental railroads and takes from the American people the benefits that would follow free and unfettered competition. If we can not exempt from tolls our vessels passing through the canal, its benefits will accrue to England and not to us.

In the early part of the last century we carried nearly all our exports and imports, but we were induced to make an agreement with Great Britain in 1815 in which we reciprocally allowed her the same rates in American ports as our own shipping paid. That agreement was to the effect that we should not impose upon English shipping any taxes that we did not impose upon our own. That was an agreement similar to that made in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty about the Panama Canal. Under the 1815 agreement we gave up differential duties, while England immediately subsidized her shipping. She also imposed higher rates on shipping in the foreign trade than on her coastwise trade, from which all foreign ships were excluded. And she maintains that difference until this day. An American vessel entering the port of Bristol, for instance, coming from an American port, pays 56 cents per ton port charges, while an English vessel pays only 20 cents. In the United States the foreign vessel pays 12 cents port charges, while American vessels pay nothing. Pilotage fees are also excepted to American vessels in the domestic trade. So it appears that our contention in regard to domestic shipping on the Panama Canal is precisely the same as the British contention in regard to "equality of treatment" under the commercial agreement of 1815; and, what is more to the point, the Supreme Court of the United States, with the present Chief Justice White delivering the opinion, sustained that contention.

American ships in 1913 carried only 8.9 per cent of imports and exports. We can not compete with foreign shipping in the foreign trade. Great Britain employs on her ships about 40,000 Lascars, or Hindus, who live on rice and use the least amount of clothing possible. One of her ships came into the port of Philadelphia in cool weather with Lascar sailors barefooted and wearing cotton clothing. Japan employs seamen of a similar character and who accept a like pittance of wages, and then Japan pays high subsidies.

Chinese are employed generally on vessels on the Pacific. They are employed on subsidized vessels of the Canadian Pacific Railroad. So that it may easily be seen how utterly impossible it will be for American ships to compete with foreign vessels any more after the Panama Canal is opened than is the case to-day unless our legislation is changed to help American ships.

The Democratic Party provided in the Panama Canal act for the free admission of foreign vessels to engage in the foreign trade of this country. But there has been no admission of such vessels under that law, because a foreign vessel can not afford to fly the American flag and employ American officers, as it would have to do under our laws, and give the crew American wages and food and other requirements necessary under our statutes. That shows the folly of attempting to build up shipping unless we meet the competition of foreign countries by the giving of subsidies or other aid.

In the tariff law a provision was inserted giving a lower rate of duty of 5 per cent on imports brought to this country in American vessels from such countries as have no treaties with us providing for equality in such matters. The object of that legislation was principally to lower the tariff. There are countries from which our vessels have brought imports that have no such treaties with the United States, but our free-trade administration assumed the authority to nullify that act. The appraisers in New York do not take that view. They could not do so without a violation of their oaths of office. But the administration does not want to help American shipping in that way and has appealed the matter to the United States Supreme Court. There can hardly be a shadow of doubt as to the decision of that body and the necessary refunding of the excess duties imposed without reason by the administration. That action, however, shows that American shipping can expect no favor from this free-trade administration, and that is one reason for asking for the nullification of the action of Congress in providing for free tolls in our own canal across the Isthmus.

The Commissioner of Navigation, in his report for 1912, states that British steamers get coal cheaper than those of the United States. About 20 per cent of the operating expenses, excluding wages, are involved in the handling of coal. The commissioner says:

Without discussing causes, the fact is indisputable that wages on American ships are higher than on foreign ships.

The reservation of our coastwise trade to American bottoms dates back to December 31, 1792. It has been asserted that this exclusion of foreign competition in the domestic trade has caused our shipping to decline, and a Democratic Member of this body has offered a bill to admit foreign shipping to participation in the coastwise trade. That illustrates the misinformation abroad on this subject. Our coastwise shipping has been increasing to an enormous extent, so that it is much greater than that of any other nation in the world, and the rates charged have declined more than one-half. Shipping in the foreign trade, which is subject to foreign competition, has declined to a still greater extent, while that in the coastwise trade, which is absolutely protected from foreign competition, has enormously increased. If our coastwise trade is submitted to the same competition as our foreign trade, the same result will follow, and within a comparatively short time we would have to do our coastwise shipping on Japanese and other foreign vessels or on those employing Chinese and Hindu seamen.

American ships to South America must pay American wages, and they can not get crews in South American countries. But British, German, Italian, and other foreign vessels pay the wages of their home country. As a result we have little American shipping going to South America, and that trade is subject to foreign combinations, and we suffer from discrimination in other ways, greatly to the injury of our commerce. The trouble grows out of the much higher wages paid in this country. There are no restrictions as to watch officers on British ships, but all such officers on American ships must be American citizens. The tonnage of the United States, documented for the coasting trade, in 1912 comprised 6,782,082 gross tons, while the total tonnage of the German Empire is only 4,711,998 gross tons. But to admit foreign vessels to our coastwise trade would close many American shipyards and lead to even a greater decline than has taken place in our vessels in the foreign trade.

The increase in the coastwise trade that would follow through the exemption from tolls of coastwise vessels in the Panama trade would be of enormous advantage in helping our shipbuilding. We have not been able to specialize in this country as they do in Great Britain. In a great shipyard there they will be building several vessels of the same size at the same time, thus greatly reducing the cost. But we can not do that in this country, because there is no demand for vessels in the foreign trade. Hence there may be one large vessel and three or four others of different sizes, making specialization an impossibility. By the use of the Panama Canal for our vessels free of tolls it would give a great impetus to vessels going to the Pacific coast and to Hawaii and to the Philippine Islands, and would aid greatly in the work of specialization in the construction of such ships.

In the Suez Canal the method of measuring the tonnage of ships is such as to increase the tonnage 11 per cent above that which would be charged in the Panama Canal. That would make quite a difference in toll charges, being that much greater to the same vessels at Suez than at Panama.

The toll to be imposed at Panama is $1.20 per net ton. At Suez the British Government, which controls the canal, imposes a toll of $1.30 per net ton on ships with cargo, 82 cents on ships in ballast, and $1.03 for each passenger over 12½ years old. The tolls at Suez are so high that the British Government has been receiving a dividend of 31 per cent from its 176,602 shares of the Suez Canal capital stock, which Great Britain acquired at a cost of less than $20,000,000. It takes 17 hours to pass through the Suez Canal without locks, while only 12 hours will be required at Panama with locks. The Suez Canal cost, up to the end of 1910, $126,642,406, and it has outstanding capital obligations of $92,284,544. The Panama Canal will have cost over $400,000,000, over three times as much as the Suez Canal, and yet we impose toll rates very much less than those of Suez.

But that does not satisfy the British Government. It insists that we shall impose tolls on our coastwise vessels. That insistence is not justified in any sense whatever. We took into consideration the tonnage of our coastwise shipping in fixing the tolls, so that foreign vessels are not charged a cent more because coastwise shipping is exempted. There is no reason for the British protest from any point of view whatever, except to benefit the Canadian railroads and the Canadian ships which will do considerable of our trade. It is like the matter of imposing a duty on tea. Canada for long years has admitted tea free, but when it comes from the United States a duty is imposed. That prevents our railroads from carrying a pound of tea to Canada, while a considerable proportion of the tea consumed in this country has been brought on Canadian railroads, and particularly on the Canadian Pacific line, from the Pacific coast. Now, while we make the tolls lower on the Panama Canal than those charged on the Suez Canal, and while we do not impose one penny on British shipping because of the exemption of our coastwise trade, yet the British Government says, without any reason, that we must not give our coastwise shipping any such advantage.

President Wilson immediately abandoned the platform of his party and his own pledges and asks his party to do the same, because of this outrageous demand on the part of the British Government. And a majority of his party in the House of Representatives accepts the dictation and votes, without knowing why, to repudiate its own party platform and the pledges made in the canvass and the law passed by Congress, simply because he asks it to do so.

We could have put the toll rates at $1.62 a ton as easily as at $1.20, and in doing so there would have been very few American ships outside of the coastwise trade that would have had to pay any of the tolls. Thus we surrendered 42 cents a ton for the benefit of the world's commerce. On the British estimate of her tonnage to pass through the canal that 42 cents will amount to $1,680,000 a year as a gift to British shipping. That is our contribution to her subsidies. This is not a question of subsidy but one of right and justice. We are asked to surrender our rights and give up our own property at the demand of a foreign power. The bill as it passsed the House goes even further than the President asked, by striking out the provision of law authorizing the levying of a smaller toll on American vessels.

Great Britain says that we have no right to pay back tolls after they are collected, because that is no difference in principle from the plan of exempting our coastwise vessels from tolls. And yet other nations have been doing that thing in the Suez Canal and propose to do it at the Panama Canal, for which provision has been already made by Russia and Spain. But this country, which has expended $400,000,000 for the canal, and which owns it and the ground on which it is dug, can not do anything of that kind.

It is too ridiculous to be taken into consideration, but nothing appears to be too absurd in that way for this administration. A toll of $1.20 means $9,600 for a ship of 8,000 tons registered capacity, or $12,000 for a 10,000-ton vessel. That will give some idea of the difference that the imposition of this toll will make in the rates charged by coastwise shipping and the benefit that Canada will gain by compelling our vessels to pay tolls, and also the aid that will be given to the Pacific railroads. Last year we passed over 40,000,000 tons through the Sault St. Marie Canal free, although the Government dug that canal and maintains it and Canada shares in the free use of it.

That privilege given to Canada is under an agreement made in 1871 somewhat similar to that we have made with Great Britain in regard to the Panama Canal, though Great Britain gives us nothing in return for the privileges we grant her at Panama, while we were to have under the agreement concerning the Sault Ste. Marie and other canals the like use of the Welland Canal. But as soon as that agreement went into effect Canada imposed a discriminating duty at the Welland Canal, so that a vessel unloading at Oswego or any other American port on Lake Ontario would have to pay 18 cents a ton higher toll than if she unloaded at Montreal. For years our vessels paid that excessive discriminating toll, but finally our Government retaliated by imposing a discriminating tax on Canadian ships passing through the "Soo" Canal. Then the British Government had the discriminating duty at the Welland Canal removed, but it stated in doing so that it did not yield the right to impose such a duty. And yet under her eleventh-hour construction to an agreement without giving any return she holds that we can not favor our domestic shipping on the Panama Canal that has cost us $400,000,000.

The treaty of 1815 is even stronger on the question of "equal treatment" than the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The 1815 treaty reads:

> No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

But under that provision of the treaty of 1815 providing for equal treatment we exempted American vessels from the payment of pilotage fees imposed by Federal and State laws. That was asserted to be a violation of the treaty, and the matter was finally taken to the Supreme Court, and in the decision, written by Chief Justice White, the court in passing upon the question said:

> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

There seems to be no way of disputing that decision, although the President appears to think that his view is superior to that of the Supreme Court. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 contains this provision:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Equal treatment or entire equality is the same in this case as in the treaty of 1815 under which Great Britain discriminated against American vessels in port charges in the United Kingdom, while the 1871 agreement, under which discriminating rates were imposed on the Welland Canal, provided for reciprocal treatment. Great Britain still adheres to her right to impose such discriminating rates in the Welland Canal, though it denies our right to discriminate in the Panama Canal. We never questioned Great Britain's right to discriminate in favor of her shipping in port charges, and we have discriminated in favor of our own shipping in such charges at our ports, but have treated all other nations on an equality, and that is what we propose to do in the Panama Canal. That view has been sustained by some of the best lawyers and judges in this country and abroad and by our Supreme Court.

Even Great Britain has conceded our right to aid coastwise shipping in this manner. In a communication from that Government on November 14, 1912, it is stated:

If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by the exemption of bona fide coastwise traffic, then England could not complain.

Sir Edward Grey, the British foreign minister, also proposed arbitration, but President Wilson takes no heed of that, but proposes surrender without even arbitrating the matter. The right of this country to exempt its coastwise shipping from tolls in the canal is not only in accordance with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court but is in harmony with the opinions of some of the best lawyers in this and other countries, including former President Taft and his Secretary of State, Mr. KNOX. Mr. Olney, who was Attorney General and Secretary of State under the Cleveland administration; former President Roosevelt; Senator O'GORMAN, who was long a member of the New York State Supreme Court; Mr. Butte, a German international jurist of high repute; Edward S. Cox-Sinclair, an able English jurist; C. A. Hereshoff Bartlett, another English jurist; Count Reventlow, a noted German international authority; Justice Samuel Seabury, of the New York Supreme Court; and many other distinguished jurists, to say nothing of those in Congress, including such men as Speaker CLARK and Mr. UNDERWOOD in the House; Mr. FITZGERALD, chairman of the Appropriations Committee; and other eminent Democrats in both Houses of Congress. Senator LODGE, who reported the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for ratification, said in this body:

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its vessels. I did not suppose that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

Mr. LODGE has reiterated that belief at this session.

Mr. Olney, a man so highly respected by President Wilson that he was offered the ambassadorship to Great Britain and later the head of the reserve board, and who has made a thorough study of this subject, read before the American Society of International Law in this city last April a paper on the subject containing this statement:

On the grounds, and in view of the considerations above stated, the United States may contend, and it is believed can rightly contend, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 does not, as justly interpreted, prevent the United States from exempting its coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal.

Mr. Butte, the German jurist, said:

From the standpoint of abstract justice the pretension of Great Britain that she should be put on the same footing as respected the use and enjoyment of the Panama Canal as the United States seems presumptuous.

Mr. C. A. Hereshoff Bartlett, an eminent English jurist, says:

There is no evasion of the rule of equality where all foreign vessels are subject to the same duties and liabilities under similar circumstances. The treaty could never have been intended to prevent the Federal Government from arranging and regulating its domestic and coastwise commerce and in the use and enjoyment of its own property as it saw fit. No such restriction could have been in view in adopting "as the basis for neutralization" a rule that the canal should be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality. It would be absurd for the United States to solemnly declare that its own vessels of war might openly and freely navigate its own land-locked waterways and enjoy the privileges that belong to the Nation as a sovereign power in the use of its own territory. The use of the words "vessels of war" shows plainly that the word "vessel" as used refers only and exclusively to those of all nations other than those of the United States, and that the word "nations" was restricted to foreign nations; that is to say, nations foreign to the United States.

Count Reventlow, the noted German authority, says:

That the United States had a right to construe the treaty as Taft did can not be doubted.

Former Senators Towne, Butler, Turner, and others who were in this body when the treaty was considered agree with former Senator Bard, of California, who said:

It was generally conceded by Senators that * * * the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the Senator from Utah will recall, about that time I was very deeply interested in trying to get legislation that, in my judgment, would have tended to rehabilitate our American merchant marine. When the question on the Bard amendment came before the Senate it was so clear to my mind that under our navigation laws, which had been in existence for a hundred years, we would have an equal right to pass our ships through that American waterway as we had to pass them through the other American waterways of the country, that I voted against the Bard amendment.

I have never before stated this in public, and I am glad of an opportunity now to say that that was the controlling thought in my mind and the thought which led me to vote against that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection, Mr. President, I desire also to say that ex-Senator Bard has told me personally that he was assured, not by one, but by nearly all of the Senators that the statement made by him was the basis of the vote that was cast in the Senate of the United States at that time.

Ex-Senator Towne, of Minnesota, a Democrat, says:

I remember distinctly my own feeling about the matter at the time, which was that we retained under the treaty full sovereignty over the canal and over the incidents of its ownership and control, including the right to fortify it and to regulate its use by vessels of commerce, subject only to the condition that all other nations should be treated alike, and that was the general understanding.

It is unnecessary to quote other authority on the subject. The bill originated in the House of Representatives and passed this body without any Democratic opposition. Certainly the eminent lawyers of this country and others who uphold our right to exempt coastwise vessels from tolls are as good authority as the President and Secretary of State, neither one of whom has been a practicing lawyer and who have changed their opinions completely. Then when we take, in connection with this matter, the platform of the Democratic convention, on which the Democratic Party appealed to the country in 1912, it is impossible to understand the President's situation at the present time.

Even Senator STONE, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, admits that we have the right under the treaty to exempt coastwise vessels from tolls, but tries to make it appear that that question is not involved in the consideration and passage of this bill. I can not agree with the distinguished Senator, for that, in my opinion, is the vital question.

The Democratic platform emphatically declared in favor of exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls in the canal. Mr. Bryan is credited with the composition of the platform and was chairman of the committee, which was composed of eminent Democrats, not one of whom would be apt to subscribe to such a plank unless he believed in it. To emphasize the matter the platform declares:

Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

Not a word of opposition was raised in the convention or during the canvass to these declarations by Democrats, and Mr. Wilson approved and asserted in a public address that—

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies; it means business; it means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines.

No doubt many votes were caught by that molasses plank, as the President must now describe it. The senior Senator from New Jersey and others have attested to the wide use of that plank. But now it is repudiated by pressure of foreign influence. Washington, the Father of our Country, wisely remarked:

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence—I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens—the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

Nothing better illustrates the truth of what the immortal Washington said than this case. The repeal of this law will be a great benefit to the United Kingdom. The London Times says:

The law will prove a little short of disastrous to British shipowners. With their best brains and energy devoted to their work, the United States will now proceed to turn out vessels on a wholesale scale, and, aided by their freedom from Panama Canal tolls, there is little to prevent them from entering with success all those trades in which British shipowners are now the principal carriers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington makes the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Poindexter	Sterling
Bankhead	Hughes	Pomerene	Stone
Borah	Johnson	Ransdell	Sutherland
Brady	Jones	Robinson	Thomas
Brandegee	Kern	Saulsbury	Thompson
Bristow	La Follette	Shafroth	Thornton
Bryan	Lane	Sheppard	Tillman
Burleigh	Lippitt	Sherman	Townsend
Burton	McCumber	Shields	Vardaman
Chamberlain	Martine, N. J.	Shively	Walsh
Chilton	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Clapp	Overman	Smith, Ga.	West
Gallinger	Owen	Smith, Mich.	Williams
Gore	Page	Smith, S. C.	Works
Hitchcock	Perkins	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I had just finished reading an item taken from the London Times, referring to the act of the Senate in exempting our coastwise ships from tolls.

That accounts for the "wiles of foreign influence" of which Washington spoke. The case is the more remarkable because of the flagrant violation of the Democratic platform. Secretary Bryan says that—

A man who secures office upon a platform, and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him, is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

And Mr. Bryan said, further:

Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should, as an official, do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does that mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election. * * * If a man, after his election, finds that his platform contains something which he can not honestly support, what ought he to do? He should resign and let the people select a man to do what they would have him do. I desire to announce it as a settled principle, not to be questioned in this country, that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform.

Just how Mr. Bryan explains his own dereliction would puzzle the traditional Philadelphia lawyer to tell. But there is no record of his having selected this particular plank to make a speech on apparently to catch votes, as in the case of others.

That is only one of a number of important violations of the Democratic platform. One of their campaign slogans was the cloture and other alleged czarlike rules of the other branch of Congress when the Republicans were in control, and yet never in the history of that branch of Congress was so important a measure as this one about canal tolls put through in such a complete czarlike manner. No amendment was allowed and only a short time permitted for debate. Chairman UNDERWOOD asserted that 50 Democratic Members of that body could not have been elected excepting for the opposition to cloture, which was so rigidly enforced in this case.

The Democrats have shamefully violated their civil-service plank by "riders" throwing open to political appointment many hundred places formerly under civil-service regulations, and all with the President's approval; they charged their opponents with wasteful extravagance, and yet have increased appropriations beyond anything known before in the history of the Government; they demanded that the recommendations for judicial appointments should be made public and have now repudiated that plank; they demanded that appointments in Alaska should be made from residents and persons familiar with the Territory, while one of the most important appointments was that of a man who has never been within thousands of miles of the Territory. Able and experienced diplomats, who in many cases won their appointments by long service, have been removed without compunction and a brewer and other such men never before heard of in a public way, but who made liberal Democratic campaign contributions, have been appointed in their places.

Perhaps, in view of this record, the request of the President, made without reason, for Congress to repudiate its own action and his party to violate its platform is not as remarkable as ordinary mortals would think it to be. The Democratic platform declared in favor of "a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drained the substance of the people," and yet they have increased the number of employees on the Federal pay roll to a total of 470,015, a greater increase than has taken place before in the history of the Government.

Coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal are to be denied freedom from tolls because, we are told, it is a subsidy, but such vessels have the free use of other waterways costing the Government over $700,000,000. Is it subsidy in one case and not in another? Are free tolls a ship subsidy in 1914 and not in 1912? We have expended $260,000,000 in the last six years for our rivers and harbors. Is that not ship subsidy? We have appropriated $3,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River. Is that not river subsidy? Would you not call it cattle subsidy for the Government to expend hundreds of thousands of dollars for the eradication of the cattle tick? Is it not cotton subsidy to expend millions of dollars for the destruction of the boll weevil? Is it not an automobile subsidy to appropriate $25,000,000 for good roads? Is it not a foreign subsidy when we are forced to pay duty to other nations on our exports, while we admit their exports into our country free of duty? I ask these questions in all seriousness, and could proceed along the same line with many others.

Coal is taken down the Ohio River, as a result of Government improvements, to New Orleans, a distance of 2,000 miles, without the payment of a cent to the Government for its canalization of the Ohio River and other such improvements. But if it is to be continued to the western coast, a charge of nearly 50 cents a ton is to be made for a 52-mile trip through an American canal. Congress has recently voted $35,000,000 for the construction of railroads in Alaska, and particularly to develop the coal of that section. But if the West is to have the advantage of competition in coal, it is denied by taxing the eastern product nearly 50 cents a ton for passing through a Government canal. There is not a particle of difference in the way of subsidy from the free use of waterways constructed and improved by the Government and the free use of the Panama Canal.

But the imposition of tolls on our domestic merchandise going through that canal will help the Pacific railroads, and will be particularly beneficial to British investments in Canada, and that is the milk of the coconut. Former President Taft is one of the best lawyers in the country, and was a judge of very high reputation. He says:

After a full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls, and the imposition of tolls on the vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade, is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Disraeli, when premier of England, declared that it was cheaper to buy control of the Suez Canal than to dig it, and that England would gain control in that way, which she did by an expenditure of only about $20,000,000. And although she insists that we shall have no rights over our own canal on our own territory, built at such an enormous cost, yet she does hold control over the Suez Canal for her own particular benefit. Within six years after Disraeli had secured control of the Suez Canal, Great Britain made use of it for her war purposes. The British commander, Lord Wolseley, took possession of the canal, closed it to all commerce, and made it the base of his line of operations against the Egyptians under Arabi Pasha. He was victorious, and the British Government was so pleased that they made him a peer and gave him $100,000 in cash.

In 1885 representatives of the powers interested in Egypt met in London to provide for the more complete neutralization of the canal; but the British Government, through Sir Julian Pauncefote, submitted a memorandum stating that Great Britain reserved the right to make use of the canal when necessary for her purposes in Egypt. Although an agreement was reached at a conference held in Paris, and afterwards signed in Constantinople, Great Britain distinctly reserved, by the use of the note presented in London by Sir Julian Pauncefote, the right to use the canal for the benefit of Egypt, the same as she had done under Lord Wolseley, and, of course, that means for the benefit of the United Kingdom. An announcement was made in 1898 in the House of Commons, by Mr. Curzon, under secretary of state for foreign affairs, while speaking for the Government, that, owing to the British reservation, "the terms of the convention have not been brought into practical operation." The United States has recognized the absolute control of the Suez Canal by Great Britain, and asked the Government of that country at the time of the Spanish-American War whether it would permit American warships to pass through the canal. Secretary Day, in his dispatch to Ambassador Hay, at that time remarked:

So far as the department is advised, Great Britain is the only Government that owns any stock, or, at any rate, a considerable amount of stock, in the canal, and, therefore, the only one in a position to assert any claim of control on that ground.

The United States owns the Panama Canal and owns the ground on which the canal was dug, but Great Britain pretends under the Hay-Pauncefote agreement that we can not do with our own canal what she has done with the Suez Canal, in which her only interest is that growing out of stock which she purchased from the Khedive of Egypt. She closed that canal's commerce at one time, and reserves the right to do it again, but says that we can not do so with our own canal. President Wilson should take to heart the words of President Cleveland in a much more critical period than this concerning the Panama Canal. Mr. Cleveland said:

> There is no calamity a great nation can invite that equals the supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

The British note of protest contains this statement:

> Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government does not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

If we can exercise belligerent rights, then we can exempt our coastwise shipping from tolls. There is no provision, according to the British construction of the treaty, for our exercise of belligerent rights, and this is merely a concession on Great Britain's part to induce us to give up freedom for our domestic traffic through our own canal. Another concession which the British Government is now willing to make, though in violation of its contentions heretofore, is stated in these words by Sir Edward Grey:

> His Majesty's Government do not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies * * * to any particular branches of that shipping.

Heretofore the British have held that we could not do so, but now they offer a subterfuge by which we can accomplish the same end by putting money in one pocket and taking it out of the other, though without conceding our right to exempt coastwise shipping from tolls. Justice Seabury, a member of the New York State Supreme Court, says:

> The British protest concedes that some of the conditions of the treaty have been modified by subsequent events. If that be so, then the whole treaty is voidable. If the state of things which was the vital condition of the treaty no longer exists, the whole treaty may be abrogated. Either one or all of its terms are binding, or none of them is binding.

That is the practical truth of the matter, even though the British contentions had been originally conceded to have been correct. The United States under the treaty did not agree that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of equality." It simply gives that privilege to those nations observing its rules. It is ridiculous to assume that the United States can only use the canal by observing its own rules. All nations in that case simply means "all other nations." The United States prescribes the rules and is owner of the canal.

The treatment, control, and regulation of the domestic commerce of the United States and all of its instrumentalities is a matter which does not concern foreign nations, and is not germane to the question of neutralization. Vattel, in his great work upon the Law of Nations, says:

> The reason of the law of the treaty—that is to say, the motive which leads to the making of it and the object in contemplation at the time—is the most certain clue to lead us to the discovery of its true meaning, and great attention should be paid to this circumstance whenever there is question either of explaining an obscure, ambiguous, indeterminate passage in a law or treaty, or in applying it to a particular place. When once we certainly know the reason which alone has determined the will of the person speaking, we ought to interpret and apply his words in a manner suitable to that reason alone; otherwise, he will be made to speak and act contrary to his intention and in opposition to his own views. (Book 2, ch. 17, sec. 287.)

The language of the treaty can not be made to read to include the domestic commerce of the United States without "too restrained or refined reading." One of the rules that we have adopted concerning the canal provides that—

> The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility committed within it.

Hence, if the United States should go to war with any other nation, under the British construction we must, under our own rules, not blockade the canal or make use of it in any way for war purposes, excepting where we grant the same rights to the enemy. We are spending millions of dollars on defenses for the canal, but as, under the British construction, we can not use them against an enemy, it is all a waste of money.

In the treaty for the neutralization of the Suez Canal, to which the United States was not a party, it provides:

> The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open in time of war, as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce and of war, without distinction of flag. Consequently the high contracting parties agree not in any way to interfere with the free use of the canal in time of war or in time of peace.

But the British have openly violated this provision, as already stated, and made use of the canal for war purposes. Moreover, about the only use that could be made of the canal for war purposes would be in case that a European power wanted to attack India or an oriental power wanted to bring its warships through to attack British possessions in Europe. But the British Government has taken great care to prevent anything of that kind. Aden, at the southern entrance of the Red Sea, is fortified in a most thorough manner, and since the canal was dug Great Britain has strongly fortified the island of Perim, which, with the fortifications at Aden, gives her complete control of the entrance to the Red Sea, making it virtually a British lake. In addition she has fortifications at Cyprus, Malta, and Gibraltar, besides controlling Egypt. No enemy would think of attempting to send a fleet to India by way of the Suez Canal or of bringing a fleet from the Orient into the Mediterranean through the canal. The European powers protested against the actions of Britain in thus practically fortifying the canal, and her representative, Lord Pauncefote, the joint author of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, said to them:

> Egypt having become British territory since the construction of the canal and the agreement with the powers, Great Britain could not be bound by the neutrality provisions adopted, so far as they affected Egypt, because it was a recognized principle of international law that treaties are only operative so long as the basic or fundamental conditions upon which they are based continue, and in the event of a fundamental change, such as the change of sovereignty of the soil, any nation which is a party to such treaty could honorably contend that it was inoperative as to her newly acquired territory.

That contention was upheld by the British Government, and the fortifications against which the protest was made were completed, apparently in direct violation of the language in the treaty provision. Now, consider the situation at Panama. The treaty was made before we became the owners of the territory through which the canal is dug. It is not a canal on foreign territory, but our own canal in our own territory, and, as the British Government said in regard to the Suez Canal, even if her construction of the treaty was correct, we could not be bound by the neutrality provisions adopted, because the territory on which the canal is dug has become American territory since the treaty was ratified, and such change of sovereignty warrants any nation which is party to such treaty to honorably contend that it is inoperative as to her newly acquired territory.

Mr. Hall, the well-known authority on international law, says:

> Neither party to an international compact can make its binding effect dependent at his will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into, and, on the other hand, a contract ceases to be binding as soon as anything which formed an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered.

Dr. Hannis Taylor, a very high American authority on international law, says:

> The conclusion is irresistible that by the radical changes wrought in conditions existing at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, through subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone by the United States, the treaty as a whole became voidable; or, to use the words of Prof. Oppenheim, that the vital change wrought by subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone rendered an otherwise "unnotifiable treaty" notifiable.

Mr. Oppenheim, professor of international law in the University of Cambridge, England, says:

> It is almost universally recognized that vital changes of circumstances may be of such kind as to justify a party in notifying a non-notifiable treaty. The vast majority of publicists, as well as all the governments of the members of the family of nations, agree that all treaties are concluded under the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus.

The change in the ownership of the Canal Zone justifies the same construction as that put on the Suez Canal treaty by Lord Pauncefote. The canal is now a part of our coastwise system, and many of the best legal authorities of the world can be quoted in support of our claim as fixed in the law already passed, and as practically upheld by our own Supreme Court. As to the coastwise trade, it follows from the invariable practice of both England and the United States that it is not covered by the treaty any more than the trade through the "Soo" or any other canal or waterways exclusive of Panama, which have cost the United States about $700,000,000 of public money. In the year 1912 the tonnage through the "Soo" Canal was so great that if we had charged only 25 cents a ton that would have amounted to $18,000,000. But under the President's construction we virtually paid that much in subsidies to vessels using that canal. As stated before, England paid in a single year $1,663,920 to the Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. on its vessels that passed through the Suez Canal. Germany paid to the North German Lloyd Line $1,385,160 in a year, or more than the tolls through the canal. Japan paid $1,336,000 to one of its lines operating through the canal, which was two and a half times the tolls that line paid. But the British Government says that we can not pass our own domestic vessels through our own canal or even make direct repayment to them of the tolls they pay, a contention that is, in the light of the facts, extremely ridiculous. The British contention is that—

> All vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of tolls.

This means not only our coastwise shipping but war vessels and everything else. But our coastwise shipping was considered in fixing tolls.

Prof. Emory Johnson, the expert employed in furnishing information for imposing canal tolls at Panama, estimated that free tolls to our coastwise shipping will save the American people in 10 years $100,000,000 in reduced freight charges. It is well understood the consumer will pay the canal tolls. The president of the Hawaiian Steamship Co., which has been sending a very large tonnage over the Tehuantepec Railroad, a British concern, stated before a congressional committee that he and other shipowners were indifferent as to whether or not tolls were imposed on coastwise ships, because the consumer and not the steamship company would pay the tolls. In fact, the imposition of tolls would practically be a subsidy to the transcontinental railroad lines, of which the Canadian Pacific road, a British-owned concern, would profit perhaps more than any other line. The exemption from tolls would not be of benefit to coastwise shipping, excepting to enable them to lower rates and better compete with the railroads. Every dollar in toll imposed on vessels gives the railroads that much more in freight rates. Oranges and lemons from California to New York pay $27 a ton to railroads in refrigerator cars. But they can be handled through the canal in about the same time for $7 a ton. The consuming public will save $10,000,000 a year on oranges and lemons alone. President Wilson, the candidate, remarked on this subject:

Free toll for American ships through the canal and the prohibition of any ship from passing through which is owned by any railroad company—you can see the object of that, can't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

COASTWISE TRADE AND AN AMERICAN CANAL.

Coastwise trade is interstate commerce, whether through the Panama Canal belonging to the Nation or through the "Soo" or any other canal. The Constitution lodges the power to regulate such trade solely with Congress. A treaty can not take away that right. The Senate rejected the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty because the Senate desired in explicit terms the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that the United States should have the right to fortify and defend the canal, and that the other powers should not have the right to interfere in the management of the canal, all of which was granted in the second treaty, of which Secretary Hay said:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be entirely an American canal. The enormous cost of construction is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

The United States, on one side, was to own, build, manage, make rules, and so forth, and on the other side, "all nations," whom Great Britain said she represented, were to observe the rules, and if they did they were to have use of the canal on equality. The United States did not provide the canal and then guarantee its use to itself on the observance of certain rules and conditions it was to impose. The United States agreed that there should be no discrimination against any "such nation," which simply means that all nations which observe the rules should be treated alike. If we can not grant our ships any reduction in tolls, we can not allow them any privileges of docking, refitting, supplying coal or stores, repairing, or any other benefit not allowed to the ships "of all nations." No sensible man will contend that we made any such agreement. Secretary Hay, speaking for our Government, objected "to inviting other powers to become contract parties to a treaty affecting the canal," and further asserted that we had "the clear right to close the canal against another belligerent and to protect and defend it by whatever means might be necessary." That is the statement of the man who made the treaty, or drew it up. But we could not do what he says we can do under the construction the British Government now puts on the treaty.

AN ABSURD CONSTRUCTION—BRITAIN AND FAVORED-NATION CLAUSE.

It does not seem reasonable for any person to contend that in the phrase "all nations observing these rules" we meant to include ourselves, and that we must be on terms of equality with ourselves, and as a belligerent respect the neutrality of our own property, and otherwise act in conformity with the rules we adopt, or else be excluded from the use of our own canal.

Great Britain pretended to have rights in Nicaragua, which she afterwards greatly extended in violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was in recognition of such pretended rights, and the lack of capital, that led to the agreement, of which nothing ever came and which was abrogated under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Great Britain made no claim to Panama territory, and if the French company had succeeded in digging the canal, they would have been under no obligation to Great Britain, and we are not under any obligation to England in this matter either. Lord Lansdowne, in a communication to Lord Pauncefote, in October, 1901, said that the purpose the British Government had in view was "that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than any other power"; in other words, seeking the most-favored-nation clause and nothing more, to which we have made no objection.

We are told that Secretary Knox was in a fair way to reach an understanding satisfactory to both countries when Senator Root delivered his speech in this body upholding the British contention to even a more marked extent than the British Government itself had put forward. That speech led the British Government, apparently, to take another view of the situation.

For nine years the provisions of the treaty with Panama were unchallenged by Great Britain. But in November, 1912, Sir Edward Grey pointed out that as the vessels of Panama will contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal the release of them from paying tolls would be an infringement upon Great Britain's rights. If we can not exempt our own vessels, we must not exempt those of any other nation. We have spent this enormous sum of money on the canal, apparently, not for our own benefit but more particularly for that of Great Britain, who has practically one-half the shipping of the world. Thomas Jefferson said that "the marketing of our products will be at the mercy of any nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them." Great Britain is largely in that position and wishes to retain her advantage and never again to see us in the favorable position we were in former times when we carried 95 per cent of our own trade instead of a little over 8 per cent as at present. Some of Britain's friends in this country have done a great deal to bring about this extraordinary situation at this time. The Carnegie Peace Foundation, for instance, admitted that it had spent over $30,000 in a propaganda campaign for the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause, and further stated that 750,000 copies of Senator Root's speech had been circulated in this campaign, and 1,000,000 circular letters had been sent to individuals and organizations. What else it may have done will probably never be known unless its books are examined, but Mr. Carnegie's millions have probably served to a large extent in helping the British side of this case.

The British Government is not slow in looking out for its own interests. Not long since it increased the subsidy to the Royal Mail Line $360,000 a year to "develop the service." Because of our lack of shipping facilities we have a small percentage of the trade in South America and are subject to prejudicial combines of foreign shipping, principally that of Great Britain. She does not want us to interfere with her advantages in that respect, and that is one reason for seeking to prevent us from building up our shipping by the exemption of any part of it from tolls in the canal, although that shipping would not compete with Great Britain directly and would not, because of its exemption from tolls, have the slightest effect upon the tolls imposed on British or any other vessels, for the reason that the coastwise shipping was taken into consideration in fixing the tolls. But any strengthening of our shipping will help American shipyards and threaten British supremacy in our foreign trade. It now takes our mail from 22 to 24 days to go to Valparaiso, and proportionately long to other ports in South America, whereas the time should be from 7 to 9 days quicker. The Royal Mail Line, to which Great Britain has recently increased its subsidy payment, controls much of this South American shipping.

Having passed a tariff law to help Great Britain to such an enormous extent, and her territories, including Canada, President Wilson now apparently wants to still further build up British shipping at our expense. His ambassador to the United Kingdom recently stated in a public address in London that "he could not say that the United States constructed the canal for Great Britain, but that it added greatly to the pleasure of building that great work to know that the British would profit most by its use." It looks as though it was the purpose in asking the repeal of this law exempting coastwise vessels from tolls to more thoroughly carry into effect that declaration of the ambassador in London. If British warships wanted to go to the Pacific coast they would have as much right to use the canal, under the British construction, as those of our own. And if we had another Oregon coming to the Atlantic coast, she would have to pay tolls if she used our canal for that purpose. Disraeli said:

England owns the Suez Canal, but did not build it. A channel should be established across the American Isthmus. England should not build it, but should own it.

If England gets what she is now contending for and which President Wilson wants to give her, she will own the canal as much as we do, because we can have no right in it not granted to her, notwithstanding our enormous expenditure in digging the canal and acquiring the property, which, it is estimated by competent authorities, will cost us altogether $700,000,000.

The Tehuantepec Railroad in Mexico, of which Lord Cowdray, otherwise known as Mr. Pearson, who is the brother-in-law of the British secretary of state, is the chief owner, has been carrying 750,000 tons per annum of the coastwise trade of the United States. Mr. Pearson does not want any of that freight to go by way of the Panama Canal, and if tolls are imposed on it he thinks he may retain some considerable proportion of it. He gets in the way of tolls one-third of the freight rate on this large tonnage. That is one of the great interests back of this British contention for imposing tolls on our coastwise vessels, which the President asked Congress to carry into effect in a most humiliating manner. Tolls on American goods going from New England, for instance, to the Pacific coast would be of great benefit to British shipping, as it would enable British manufacturers better to compete with our own on the Pacific coast. Railroads regulate their rates by water rates and charge little or no more, as a rule, to the Pacific coast than the steamships charge, or else the railroads would lose the freight. Hence, the benefit they would derive from the imposition of tolls, all of which would help them in imposing higher rates. The railroads did not want the canal built, and they are now anxious to weaken its competition, something that the President seems to be willing to aid in. If the canal had been built through foreign territory and under the joint control of the United States and Great Britain, as contemplated under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the situation would have been different. But under the existing conditions of ownership of both the canal and the territory on which it is located, there is no possible excuse for this House bill which we are now considering.

The attempts that have been made and which are being made in our own country and by our own citizens to convince the American people that the United States is violating its treaty obligations and is looked upon by other nations as lacking in national honor I repudiate. The Constitution confers upon Congress the power to regulate our domestic commerce, and in doing so we are not subject to the charge of violating our treaty obligations. Senators, have you stopped to think that the assaults upon our national honor come from within and not from without? Even Great Britain, through Sir Edward Grey, has intimated that we have the right to exempt our domestic commerce from tolls. No other nation that I am aware of has questioned the right, and does it not seem strange that our right to do so is only questioned by our own people? No Member of the Senate desires to preserve inviolate our treaty obligations more than I, and if I believed this Government had violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by the granting of free tolls to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal I would be the first to acknowledge it and do everything in my power to correct the wrong. I want the United States to enjoy the respect of all nations of the earth, to live in peace with all, and to maintain a desire to accord equal justice to all. This rule of conduct should apply to the smallest, weakest, and poorest as well as to the largest, wealthiest, and most powerful nations. If we must purchase foreign friendship, the price exacted must not involve us in national dishonor. If the United States were attempting to take away from England or any other nation any rights it may have acquired in the canal, the charge of national dishonor would be justified. If any nation had contributed to the cost of constructing the canal or had given some valuable consideration for the right to use it and the United States undertook to deprive such a nation of its rights, no Senator would hesitate to immediately correct such a wrong. But we are not trying to take away the rights of any nation. We paid France the cash for her interest, we paid Panama for the land within the Canal Zone, we constructed the canal which will require an annual maintenance charge of $16,000,000. Great Britain did not contribute one cent to its construction, and now to be informed that our domestic commerce, our coastwise trade, must pay tolls because of Great Britain's demand, or pay tolls to promote international friendship, or to avoid international entanglements, is a form of tribute the American people will not approve of or assume. If it had not been distinctly understood by the American people that the canal was to be an American canal, built by American genius and American money, there would have been no Panama Canal to-day.

When this question was presented to President Taft, he declared we had not violated the treaty, and gave unanswerable reasons for his position. What think you will be our position in the eyes of foreign nations if the act of the former administration is repudiated by the present one, based upon the request that it ought to be done, whether right or wrong? If our position was reversed, is there any Senator who believes that England would yield an interest of vital importance to her to our dictation? No, Mr. President, a thousand times no. And I would commend her for her loyalty to her own. I now say, without fear of contradiction, if we submit to the request and yield our constitutional rights, it will be but the beginning of further demands made upon us by other nations. I can not agree to accept the demands of England, without consideration "whether right or wrong." This is a strange and modern doctrine, a weak and defenseless position for any American to take, and is not worthy of the sons of the patriot fathers of the Revolution, who won for us by blood and sacrifice the blessing of liberty. We should encourage our own merchant marine, built on American soil and by American workmen, manned by American sailors, and flying solely the American flag.

Believing the provisions of the bill to be unwise, unnecessary, and destructive of the best interests of the American people, my duty as a Senator of the United States offers me no alternative than to vote against the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have patiently listened to the hearings and the debates upon the pending bill with an open mind, influenced as little as possible by previous impressions. I have endeavored by that means to reach conclusions which should be unaffected either by my own preconceived opinions of the aspects of the controversy or by any feeling of party loyalty beyond that involved in the platform.

Being a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I have had exceptional opportunity to listen to the hearings and the discussions provoked by them. The debates in this body have covered every feature of the controversy, and consequently I do not perceive either utility or need for recapitulation on my part, except in so far as may be necessary to define the conclusions which I have reached, and whose expression has prompted me to take the floor at this time.

Mr. President, this controversy has, I think, been magnified out of all proportion to its real importance. It has been utilized for the purpose of arousing all of the animosities, reviving all of the traditions, and reciting all our past relations with the mother country, to the end that the real question may be largely obscured. We have heard appeals to patriotism and prophecies of disaster to the Nation in the event this bill shall be enacted into law. Motives have been questioned, the judgment of the President has been challenged, and assaults upon the national sovereignty, to say nothing of the portents of disaster greatly apprehended by gentlemen whose normal temperaments are healthy and whose judgments are generally deliberate.

The controversy, Mr. President, has its genesis in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which we recognized, instead of ignoring in 1900 and in 1901. That treaty has been fruitful of nothing save controversy and of dissension. When it was before the Senate of the United States for ratification it was vigorously opposed by Senator Douglas, who protested against the placing of limitations upon the United States in Central America, and who predicted many of the dissensions which were the offspring of that treaty. That it was constantly and almost consistently disregarded by Great Britain is a matter of history; and that a treaty disregarded by one nation is not binding upon another, if it desires to avoid it, is perhaps a truism which will be accepted without any question. But, Mr. President, the United States saw fit in 1900 and 1901 to recognize its obligations under this treaty at the time when the demand for the building of the Panama Canal became insistent—and it became overwhelmingly so—as a result of the trip of the Oregon through the Straits of Magellan during the Spanish-American War.

Having recognized the treaty as a subsisting one, we were constrained to negotiate with Great Britain for its abrogation or supercession if we would have a free hand in constructing the canal; and, of course, that negotiation conceded that Great Britain had treaty rights binding upon the Government of the United States in Central America consequent upon this convention; so that as a result further negotiation with Great Britain was essential if the United States should acquire the right of sole construction and control of the canal, as it desired to do. That, of course, meant a new treaty; and a new treaty, Mr. President, was possible only should the minds of the two signatory powers, through their representatives, harmonize upon proposed changes. As a result the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was finally consummated, superseding the old contract, save as to its principle of neutralization, establishing a new one in its stead, which necessarily constitutes a binding obligation between the two sovereign powers.

Having done this, we enacted the statute of 1912, and the sole question here involved is whether the United States has the right, under its convention, to exempt its coastwise shipping from the operation of a law otherwise general in its application, or, having the right, whether it is just or expedient to exercise it. That is the sum total of the controversy.

That a Government in acknowledging a treaty obligation surrenders its sovereignty, that a Government in considering whether it should or should not legislate with reference to a treaty thereby proposes to commit itself to some policy which virtually subordinates it to the other contracting party, and thereby concludes itself, does not and can not be the logical consequence of its action. Treaty rights may be surrendered or burdensome obligations assumed, but never when the problem presents itself as one of construction whose final solution is preceded by intelligent and exhaustive consideration.

Mr. President, the conclusions which I have reached—and I shall occupy the attention of the Senate for a comparatively short time—are:

That the representatives of the signatory powers, as appears from their correspondence and the statements of the two survivors, both Americans, assumed that the terms of the treaty as finally recommended by them to the two signatory powers applied alike to the Government of the United States, to Great Britain, and to other nations observing its rules; that the language of the treaty is susceptible of the construction contended for by the opponents of the bill, but not of all the arguments used to support it. That the exemption clause of the canal act should be taken in connection with its exclusion clause. They were evidently inspired by the belief that both were essential to the operation of the canal as a permanent competitive water route, and this must be their justification. The exclusion clause is, of course, not here involved; but that the two formed part of a common policy incomplete unless both were present in this legislation is, to my mind, beyond question.

I also conclude, Mr. President, that the economic feature of this controversy is of no great practical importance. It is one which has been magnified out of all proportion to its real character.

And, lastly, that the true policy of the Government should be to make the canal free to the commerce of all the world, and own and operate its own vessels in the coast-to-coast traffic.

Mr. President, so far as the negotiations between the representatives of the two Governments are concerned, I shall have but little to say. This feature of the controversy has been elaborated with so much ability and has been so completely exhausted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that it would be worse than a waste of time for me to give it further consideration. Suffice it to say that the correspondence which has been read, the statements which have been made before the committee, and the construction placed upon them by these Senators are conclusive upon the proposition that so far as the understanding between the representatives of the signatory powers are concerned at the time of the completion of the treaty it was supposed to be universal in its application.

The United States adopted the convention of Constantinople with reference to the details of the operation of the canal, and, of course, to adopt is "to choose or to take to oneself." Hence, it would seem to me as a reasonable man that it is but natural that a nation whose representatives understood and were given to understand the phraseology of the treaty to mean a certain thing, to respectfully insist, without being charged with a design to overreach, upon the observance of that understanding through diplomatic channels, as has been done in this case, and that the American people should be free to accept or to reject the proposition without incurring either the imputation of treason or a base surrender of American sovereignty or of American honor on the one hand or of a willful disregard of their solemn obligation on the other.

Mr. President, I have said that the language of the treaty seems to be susceptible of the construction which is placed upon it by the opponents of repeal; but some of their arguments, it seems to me, prove altogether too much. If they are to be accepted at their face value they may become extremely inconvenient in their application to other clauses of this treaty and to other treaties, both those in existence and those which are in contemplation. It would seem that when the United States adopted the principles of the Constantinople convention it took them in their entirety and without qualification, because they contain no words of exception or limitation. It is therefore bound by them, and all of them, precisely as the company controlling and owning the Suez Canal is bound; that it can do what that company may do under these rules and regulations, but should abstain from doing what that company may not do under them.

We can not go to these rules and at the same time stay away from them. Therefore we should test the first clause of the third article which is directly involved in this controversy by determining how far the Suez Canal Co. may proceed thereunder by way of discriminatory action.

Mr. President, during an experience at the bar, extending over 40 years, I have always been able the better to care for the interests of my own clients by considering their contentions from the standpoint of the opposition, by occupying as far as possible the place of the attorney for the other side, and thereby thoroughly test their efficiency. I think there is no better method of ascertaining the merits of any proposition than to assume, mentally at least, an unfriendly attitude to the given question, to conjure up all possible arguments and situations of a hostile or unfriendly nature, and by applying them sift out the fit from the unfit by a process of elimination thoughtfully and thoroughly applied.

Let us apply this method to the present instance, Mr. President, and assume that the governors of the Suez Canal should by ordinance, or that Great Britain as the result of its majority ownership of the shares of stock in that canal should by order, exempt Great Britain's coast-to-coast vessels from the payment of tolls through that canal, and that by this process all of the shipping which plies between English ports and East Indian ports and the other dependencies of Great Britain should not be subject to the general law under which tolls are and have been collected upon tonnage passing through that waterway; would such action contravene the principle of the Constantinople convention? If it would, then it seems, Mr. President, to follow that the act of 1912 also contravenes it, for if article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, if not word for word, is certainly in substance, that of the Constantinople convention of 1888 with reference to the Suez Canal.

Now suppose, still further, Mr. President, that Great Britain, and not a corporation, were the owner of the Suez Canal, and that Great Britain should by statute make such exemption as the United States has made with reference to the Panama Canal, would such action contravene the provisions of the Constantinople agreement?

These questions, Mr. President, I think present a fair test for the purpose of determining, so far as the treaty is concerned, the character of the legislation in controversy. I leave them to the consideration of Senators. We may also consider two or three other propositions of similar import which, though entirely imaginary, nevertheless may be of importance in the determination of this question. Suppose that Great Britain instead of the United States had constructed the Panama Canal under precisely similar treaty stipulations; in other words, suppose that the position of the signatory powers were reversed, and that Great Britain had by a statute exempted Canadian coast-to-coast traffic from the operation of the toll section of its statute, would she thereby contravene the provisions of the Constantinople convention? And just here it must be recalled that we reserved the right by this treaty to construct the canal through private agencies; and the treaty should be considered from that viewpoint. It is important to note that when the signatory powers agreed to this convention, when the two Governments ratified the treaty, the United States was just as free to provide for the building of the canal through private enterprise as it was to build it on its own account, and we must take into consideration the fact that we might have done so when our own power and authority under the treaty to make exemptions and discriminations are challenged, for the manner of construction can not alter the effect of the obligations which we have assumed or in anywise change the meaning of the contract.

Mr. President, if the Panama Canal had been so constructed, that is to say, if it had been constructed by a private corporation aided by the United States instead of by the United States directly, and this exemption clause of the statute had been enacted or the company had sought by some regulation of its own to make the same exemption, the question arises, Would that corporation, or the United States acting through it, have thereby contravened its obligations under the Constantinople agreement?

It seems to me, giving full play to all the principles of construction which have here been so fully elaborated, that these questions are susceptible of but one answer, and that is, that the spirit and the intent of the convention would be ignored by such a regulation; and I fancy that the protests of the people of the United States, had the canal been constructed by the other signatory power, followed by the exemption of Canadian coast-to-coast traffic from its tolls, would have been far louder, far greater in volume, and far more passionate than those which are so vigorously made against the enactment of the present bill. We would, Mr. President, have planted ourselves upon the terms of the obligation assumed and would have insisted that the spirit of equality and of international morality, the declaration of neutrality, and the common purpose sought to be subserved by and between the two Governments in making the contract for so great a purpose had been ignored or disregarded, and particularly if, under those circumstances, the understanding between the representatives of the signatory powers at the time the treaty was concluded and ratified had been the same as is declared by these representatives, through their correspondence and by their survivors, to have been the case here.

Mr. President, since this is a question of power, let me put another supposition, because if the Government of the United States has the power, as it is claimed, under the treaty to make the exemption which is here in controversy, then it has the power to make the same exemption as to all of the shipping of the United States, whether it be coastwise or otherwise; that is to say, if it simply be a question of power, if the term "all nations" means all other nations, why can not the United States exempt as well its shipping engaged in the foreign trade as its shipping engaged in the coast-to-coast trade from the payment of canal tolls? Of course I am not unmindful of the proposition that the one is an exclusive monopoly, made so by our navigation laws, while the other affects traffic coming in competition with the traffic of other nations; but that is immaterial to the proposition so long as it is one of power and of right upon the part of the United States, which not being bound by the contract is free to exercise it if it sees fit so to do. Therefore it is a pertinent question whether if the United States should see fit to exempt all of its vessels from tolls the act would be a contravention of the treaty of Constantinople, which is a part of this one. It would seem that if the United States can exempt part of its shipping it can exempt all of its shipping, unless we find something besides the mere question of power and authority under the treaty which imposes a limitation.

Mr. President, the several paragraphs of the article, which is taken bodily from the treaty of Constantinople, must be taken as an entirety; that is to say, they must be considered together when questions of construction or the existence or the absence of authority for a given act based thereon may be under consideration. One of these provisions declares that the canal shall never be blockaded—a most obvious condition; one which, of course, is essential if the purposes of the treaty are to be constantly subserved, because otherwise the canal would be neither useful nor reliable as an artery either of coastwise or of international traffic, since interruptions of its operation would be easy. But is the United States exempted from that provision? Has the United States, as one of the signatory powers, as the owner and controller of the canal, the right under or independently of this treaty, itself to do that which it is declared shall not be done at all?

Do we not, Mr. President, by virtue of our insistence that the treaty clothes the United States with power, or that there is nothing in it which deprives the United States of power, to make this exemption, going so far as to assert the right of blockade should we see fit to exercise it? That we are prescribing regulations and making covenants only for other nations observing them? And yet I think no one will contend for a moment that the United States any more than any other nation observing the rules of the convention can lawfully blockade the canal. We have very properly denied ourselves that power, although we are insisting upon a construction of the treaty which, sound or unsound, will recognize in our Government the reserved right to lay an embargo on its own canal.

Of course, the Government of the United States would never pretend to do this; but we must discover where a contention will lead us if we are to determine its soundness, especially when conventions, carefully and solemnly negotiated and ratified between nations and designed to be not only a rule of property but a rule of conduct for all time and concerning a great world-wide international subject, are the subjects of disputation.

Assertions of sovereignty, of the vast amount of our expenditures, of our right to prescribe rules and regulations for others, of our right to control and use our own property, and all similar assertions seem to me to be entirely beside the main proposition. They prove nothing and demolish nothing. The only proposition in this case, namely, what is the power of the Government of the United States and its authority under the contract which it deliberately negotiated and which it is precluded from saying it was not obliged to negotiate as a condition of building the canal, since it assumed to recognize the force and effect of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the necessity of getting it out of the way before it could proceed? Merely this, and nothing more.

We are obscuring the main issue by a great many patriotic speeches, by crimination and recrimination, by imputing sinister motives and challenging sinister influences, by a great many dismal forebodings as to the consequences of our action, by protesting against the humiliation of what is called a surrender, by passionate declarations, and by invocations to the flag; but the admitted facts and circumstances which surround the negotiation and ratification of the contract surely excuse, even if they do not justify, the British Government in its policy of protest. Were conditions reversed we would do likewise, though far more forcibly.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] just now, and other Senators also, have laid great emphasis upon the assertion that if we now repeal the act whereby this exemption was created we do so at the demand of a foreign power, and thereby surrender for all time our right to control the canal in our own interest, even in time of war. The Senator from Utah grew eloquent in picturing the disastrous consequences that would result from such a surrender of this great waterway. His imagination converts it into an engine of danger instead of a weapon of defense in the event of hostilities between this and some of the other great powers of the world. Why, Mr. President, I do not think there can be any possible contradiction of the general proposition that in time of war treaties and conventions affecting or between belligerents are suspended. Were the consequences of affirmative action as dire as the Senator declares, they would, upon a declaration of war by or against us, be as though the treaty had never existed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator has struck a very interesting question, so far as I am concerned. I agree with the Senator that whereas we have a contract with England, if we should engage in a war with England all treaties between that country and this would be immediately suspended; so that in case of war with England we would not be embarrassed by any condition of this treaty which provides that the vessels of all nations, of peace or war, shall go through on equal terms. Does the Senator believe, however, that war between Japan and the United States would have the effect of abrogating a treaty between England and the United States, unless England gave its consent? If so, I should like to know upon what ground.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the law of self-preservation is as powerful with nations as it is with individuals. I assume that Japan is one of the powers that will observe the rules of the treaty to which I am referring. Whether it does or not, however, I unhesitatingly say that in the event of war with Japan our right and power to utilize this canal would so influence the treaty, if it contained any provisions affecting that right, as to set them aside and suspend them for the time being.

Mr. REED. That is to say, the Senator believes that in such an exigency as that we would simply brush aside the treaty. He does not claim that there is any clause in the treaty or any principle of law that would make it void?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, certainly not; but it becomes in suspenso during the critical period of hostilities between this Nation and any other nation in so far as we should have need of the canal either in offense or defense.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the Senator's consent, I should like to add that the same principle that suspends during the war a treaty entered into by two contracting parties in case of war between those parties applies likewise to a third party obtaining any benefit under the treaty with whom the contracting party is at war.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course; but the Senator from Missouri is assuming that no such treaty existed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The only right that Japan has here is the right to equal treatment under the treaty that the United States has made with Great Britain. Certainly a third party, with only incidental rights, could stand upon no higher footing than the other contracting party, to wit, Great Britain itself.

Mr. THOMAS. I think there can be no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield once more. I promised——

Mr. REED. If it at all interferes with the Senator's address I shall not ask to interrupt.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that it does not interfere with me; but I have assured the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who gave way to me, that I would finish as soon as possible.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. THOMAS. It is only for that reason that I answered as I did to the interruption.

Let us assume, however, that the contrary is the case, and that all of the dire results which are predicted of favorable action upon this bill will follow, and that the Government of the United States could not suspend this treaty in case of a war with Japan or even with Great Britain, in consequence of which the canal would be kept open for the passage of their vessels and munitions of war from one ocean to the other. I know of nothing better that could occur, I know of no more fortunate circumstance for the United States under those conditions. The canal, then, must, in war as in peace, be free to all nations, and the fleets of the hostile power may use it under the treaty and pass through it without hindrance or opposition.

Why, Mr. President, there is no commander, however inexperienced, who would be guilty of such stupendous folly as to attempt to negotiate such a waterway with his fleet in time of stress and conflict, under any circumstances, not even if the fate of the conflict hung in the balance, for the enemy waiting outside could destroy his vessels in detail as they came through into the open sea and passed beyond the 3-mile limit, long before they could be massed in battle formation. It is mere bombast to assert that the treaty, in the event it should remain in full force during time of war, would be a source of serious or any danger to the people of the United States or to its armies or to its navies.

I think there is no higher authority upon this subject than Admiral Evans, one of the greatest naval commanders this or any other nation ever had, a man thoroughly competent to speak upon a question of this sort, and whose words are entitled to the utmost consideration. He declares:

> The value of the canal in time of war is a question on which the officers both of the Army and Navy differ. One opinion holds that unless the canal is strongly fortified at both ends it will be of no practical value in time of war. The other opinion, and I find myself with those who hold it, is that no amount of fortifying will render the canal of real value for the passage of a fleet of war vessels from one ocean to the other after war has been declared or when war is known to be inevitable.
> At the Pacific end of the canal fortifications might be so placed on available sites as to assist a fleet in its passage from the Atlantic by holding the enemy's fleet in check until our own had completed its battle formation on the Pacific side. If we may judge by what forts have been able to do in the past when opposed by ships, we have good grounds for thinking that our fleet would run serious danger of being destroyed in detail despite the assistance of such forts.

That means, of course, that for us to attempt to pass the vessels of our fleet, in time of war, one by one through the canal, unless it were done before the hostile fleet were assembled, would be as foolish as it would be for any foreign nation to do so.

> Much would, of course, depend on the ability and courage of our enemy, and on this point we have good knowledge of the officers and men of the only nation we have any danger of ever meeting in battle in this vicinity.
> It is granted, however, that forts at the Pacific end of the canal might be of value.
>
> At the Atlantic end of the canal it is not apparent how forts, no matter how many, could assist a fleet passing through the waterway to secure a battle formation before being attacked. There are no outlying islands as on the Pacific side and no high land on which forts could be advantageously constructed.
> Some authorities think that mortar batteries would be effective for the purpose, and still others suggest airships. Naval opinion generally places about as much value on the one as on the other; we seriously doubt the ability of mortars to prevent an active naval commander inflicting fatal damage on an enemy's fleet emerging, one ship at a time, from the Atlantic entrance to the canal before it could gain a battle formation. The same opinion is held by many with reference to any guns that may be mounted on the islands about the Pacific entrance to the canal. As to airships, we may safely leave them out of consideration.

A little attention to details and the consideration of actual happenings may perhaps remove many of the apprehensions which spring from a perfervid or overheated imagination and which are designed to magnify the possible consequences of our action here in determining whether the treaty does or does not involve a given right or justify the exercise of a given authority. So, as far as my understanding of this question goes, I am not convinced that there ever will be any serious danger of any nation insisting upon using the Panama Canal for war purposes unless, indeed, as I have stated, the passage of its vessels can be swift and sure and in advance of the necessary preparations for encountering them before they can form in battle array after the passage has been effected.

To illustrate, suppose the American fleet which went around the world in 1907 had encountered a hostile fleet at either end of the Suez Canal, and our vessels had been obliged to take, or had taken, the risk of passing through the canal one by one. Do we not know that a much less powerful fleet, both in numbers and in guns, would have been superior to each one in detail, and could have destroyed our vessels in succession long before it would have been possible for them to assume the combined position at the other end which is necessary for the best results, to say nothing of their own salvation?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. REED. I understand that the Senator does not wish to be interrupted, on account of the question of time, but I have great respect for his opinion, as I know the Senate and the country have, and it seems to me he is announcing a startling proposition.

I wish to put this question to him:

Let us assume what we will all undertake to say is a very violent assumption, that we should become engaged in a war with Japan, and that Japan should be massing her vessels to attack our Pacific coast, and we had 20 dreadnaughts in the harbors of the eastern coast. Does the Senator or does any military expert undertake to say that the canal might not be the means by which we could move those vessels to the western coast, anticipating the arrival of the Japanese fleet, and get them through before there was a single vessel to attack them?

On the other hand, continuing the illustration and the question, will any military expert say that a condition might not arise by which we would have sufficient vessels at one end of the canal to protect our vessels as they came through from immediate attack at that point, and yet the necessity of getting the vessels through would be so great that the canal would be of great advantage to us?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I thought I had anticipated that question. I stated, or intended to state, that this would occur unless the canal were used for the purpose of transporting the fleet from one ocean to the other before the enemy had so organized its fleet as to make it impossible, or as to make it extremely dangerous or hazardous. Certainly if, prior to the concentration of the enemy's forces at either end of the canal, the movement is made, it would be free from the hazards and dangers to which I have referred. But, Mr. President, ours is the nearest fleet; ours is the one which, in the event of hostilities, will get there first; and I am discussing the proposition which has been put forward here with so much force by other Senators, that in such an event we would be humiliated, to say nothing of the danger and disaster to us, if this bill becomes a law, by being obliged to leave the canal open at all times, even to the vessels of an enemy of the United States engaged in actual hostilities. My contention is that nothing more fortunate could occur to the United States than for one of its enemies to attempt to negotiate the passage of the canal and insist upon its rights under those circumstances.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. REED. I agree with the Senator, but I do not put it upon the basis that he does. I simply know, treaty or no treaty, that if we had forts, as we will have forts, the enemy's vessels would never live to get well started through the canal. It would not be a question of treaties, however; it would be a question of armament, of powder, and of shell, and of common sense applied to a situation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that may be. I neither affirm nor deny the fact. The extract which I have just read from the statement of Admiral Evans, however, would seem to be somewhat in conflict with the views expressed by the Senator from Missouri as to the effective character of land fortifications. And, I may add, that there is much contrariety of opinion between naval experts as to the value of our canal fortifications for offensive purposes.

I now come to the canal act itself. I think its provisions are defensible as necessary, or as supposed to have been necessary at the time of its enactment, to accomplish the purpose for which the canal was dug. I was not a member of the Senate in 1912. I have not had time to read the debates which then occurred upon the bill; but I have some general recollection of the information which was given to the country generally through the press, and, of course, through correspondence concerning the nature and purposes of the proposed legislation. My recollection is that the canal, being designed primarily as a great waterway in the interests of commerce, both domestic and foreign, might be subject to the drastic competition and consequent control of the great lines of continental transportation; that mindful of the experiences which the country had had with these lines of railroad in the operation of steamship lines to the Panama Railroad on both sides, and the fact that the competition which once existed had been absolutely destroyed, in one instance by the purchase of the lines of vessels on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, and in the other by subsidizing an independent line so that it was justified in refusing and could make more money by refusing than by carrying freight, thus making that route worse than a negligible quantity in the general system of transportation from coast to coast, the Congress of the United States was actuated by the desire in this legislation to preserve that canal for all time for the purpose for which it was originally designed. That purpose was to construct not only a great competitive water route, but one that would be absolutely and forever free, either from control or from possible extinction, as a line of competition through the powerful action of the tremendous corporations which operate the land lines between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. Of course the Nation was justified, and would be justified now, Mr. President—because, as I have said, I think the treaty is susceptible of a construction which justifies the act—in promoting the general welfare, that being the main object of all governments, by so legislating with reference to our domestic traffic as that competition never could be extinguished or controlled, and that the canal should therefore be at all times the great regulator of traffic rates throughout the United States, keeping them down to a certain level, and thereby serving the interests and the welfare of the great mass of consumers who constitute the people of the Nation. And of course the exclusion of vessels owned or controlled by railway systems was inserted in the law for the same purpose.

Mr. President, the question in my mind again is, Will this act as it now stands effectuate that condition? Will it accomplish that purpose? I am speaking now, of course, without reference to the party pledge, to which I shall come a few moments later.

I do not think it will. I have become convinced from reading and hearing the statements of the witnesses before the Interoceanic Canals Committee and from the discussions upon this floor that the economic features of this controversy are trifling in their importance. It is true that a great vessel of 10,000 tons passing through the canal will be required to pay $12,000 in tolls, $1.20 per ton; but 10,000 tons transported from San Francisco to the city of New York, at $20 a ton, makes $200,000. It is easy, of course, to use large sums of money, and by the expression of their aggregate amount to produce a false impression. The real test is, What is the effect of a given rate upon traffic? Now, let us see.

It is declared that a shipping ton consists of 100 cubic feet. That space may be filled with lead, or it may be filled with feathers. Whatever the commodity, it is the space and not the weight of the commodity which constitutes a shipping ton. It is in evidence before the committee that, generally speaking, with reference to all bulky traffic, at least, a shipping ton is the equivalent of 2 actual tons. Now, $1.20 per shipping ton is 60 cents per actual ton, and that is 3 cents per hundred pounds. Three cents per hundred pounds would have about as much influence in the regulation of rates across the continent as a drop of water would have in affecting the level of Lake Superior. It is infinitesimal in its quantity, and it comes to nothing when you consider the great amount of traffic that is to be influenced by it.

Why, Mr. President, competitive rates as they now exist over the Tehuantepec Railroad, the charges being greater than 3 cents per hundred pounds, are sufficient, it seems, to maintain active competition between the waterway and the railways, and to enable the shippers by the use of the former to compete successfully with the traffic of the latter. This is vividly illustrated by the statement of Congressman HUMPHREY, who appeared before our committee. I read from page 404 of the hearings. He says:

> That suggests to me another question which I came very nearly forgetting, and that is the market we hope to reach and that the tolls directly affect. Let me give you an illustration of what I mean. You take a carload of fir lumber to-day, I will say 1,000 feet to-day, and you can send that lumber down the Pacific coast in a vessel to the Isthmus, 103 miles across the Isthmus by the Tehuantepec Railroad—

He should have said 184 miles—

> put it on another vessel, bring it up to Philadelphia, put it on the railroad there, and send it back to Indianapolis for about 1 cent less or 2 cents less than you can send it direct from Seattle to Indianapolis or any of the Pacific coast ports.
> Take a still more striking illustration; take canned salmon, one of our principal products on the Pacific coast. You could send a case of canned salmon, or could when I looked it up a few months ago, down the Pacific coast, across the Tehuantepec Railroad, bring it up to New York and put it on the railroad and take it to Buffalo; put it on a vessel there and take it through the Great Lakes and the Soo Canal to Duluth at just the same rates you can send it direct from Seattle to Duluth. That shows you the effect of water transportation. Now, every time that you place 1 cent upon the tolls, every time you add 1 penny to the freight that goes through the Panama Canal you restrict the market that much; you keep us from getting that much farther west and that much farther up the Mississippi River.

I asked the witness:

> If I understood your last illustration, in which you cite the transportation of salmon by water up into Duluth where it could be sold cheaper than the same canned salmon could be transported by railroad to Duluth, you run it over the Tehuantepec Railroad?
>
> Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.
>
> Senator THOMAS. How does the transportation charge of the Tehuantepec Railroad, including breakage, compare with the tolls that are proposed by this repeal bill to be placed on the same commodities going through the canal?
>
> Mr. HUMPHREY. I am not familiar with that.
>
> Senator THOMAS. It is greater, is it not?
> Mr. HUMPHREY. The rate in that way, handling and unloading, of course is a great deal greater than going through direct.

So, Mr. President, we have the condition which it is declared the repeal of this law will kill, notwithstanding the fact that the route, which is and has long been a competitive one, requires the breakage of freight twice and transshipment across the isthmus 184 miles. This record is replete not perhaps with such glaring instances, but with statements which justify the conclusion, so far as the amount of this freight is concerned, that as the basis of the economic feature of the argument it seems to me at least to be of no importance whatever.

It is true that the aggregate which would be paid in the case of tolls would be very considerable. It is true that it would probably put the Tehuantepec Railroad out of business, or at least compel it to meet the competitive route. But it is equally true, Mr. President, that in so far as its effect upon coastwise traffic is concerned its influence will be practically negligible.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the effect of the canal on the transcontinental railroad traffic will be negligible, has the Senator any explanation to offer as to the persistent opposition of the railroads of the country for more than 30 years against the construction of a canal across the Isthmus?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes, Mr. President, there is no question that the railroads desire to monopolize the entire traffic of the country. They fear water competition as they fear all competition. They do not want a competition which, in my judgment, will eventuate in the Government of the United States operating its own vessels and doing this traffic, thus compelling them to equalize rates all over the country. It is not canal tolls they are concerned about. It is water competition from coast to coast, of which canal tolls are but a feature.

Besides, Mr. President, it is the chronic policy of the railway companies always to oppose even potentially competitive routes, because they generally assume that the ultimate effect will be injurious to them, even though they may be needful to the territory immediately served.

I have already stated that the companion piece of this legislation is the exclusion of railway owned or controlled vessels from the canal. Without this they could easily, through the influences they have heretofore exercised, reduce the canal to the same condition of dependency and uselessness to which the Panama Railroad in times past was brought.

British Columbia shipping is just as active via the Tehuantepec Railroad route in competition for this coast-to-coast traffic as she will be whether this law is repealed or whether it is not. One would judge from the statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that free tolls through the canal would enable our shipping to compete with all the other nations of the world, notwithstanding differences in wages, difference in provision, cost of construction, and all the other differences which he declared to be so glaringly in contrast between them and our own. Those conditions, Mr. President, are not dependent upon canal legislation. They will not disappear with canal legislation. No matter what the differences, they are based upon other and entirely distinct and foreign reasons. Of course the Senator is too well informed not to know that just as well as I. Their place in this discussion is not apparent to me, possibly because of my limited perceptions.

Mr. President, this brings me to the real purpose for which I took the floor, and that is the discussion for a moment of the amendment which I offered providing exemption of tolls for all the traffic passing through the canal, coastwise and foreign and everything.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of all nations?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; of all nations. In the first place, Mr. President, this does not contravene, nobody claims that it contravenes, any part or portion of the treaty. It is consonant with the treaty. It is consonant with those who desire the repeal of the present law. It is consonant with the views of those who desire to keep it in existence.

Mr. President, I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I nevertheless hazard the prediction that this canal will never fully subserve the great purposes for which it was constructed, and the vast expenditure which we have made until it is made as free to the vessels of all nations as the wide ocean itself, as the Sault Ste. Marie Canal is to-day, as the Mississippi River to our domestic traffic, as the Lakes are to the great inland water traffic of the country.

Mr. President, if this canal is to become useful for over-sea traffic that traffic must be diverted from the Suez Canal. Virtually all of it goes that way. It has done this so long that it has hardened into a custom. These sea carriers have trading stations between their ports of departure and their ports of arrival on both sides of the Suez Canal. They have their coaling stations. With the exception of New Zealand and the South American coast the Suez route brings the world nearer to the great ports of Europe than by way of the Panama Canal. As a consequence, we must offer extra inducements if we are going to divert that traffic to our canal, as we can divert it to the general benefit of this country and in the interests of international commerce.

Mr. President, one of the great benefits that will result from this policy will be that the Suez Canal itself must follow our example and become in turn a great free highway for all the nations of the earth. A free Panama Canal and a toll Suez Canal could not coexist very long. The contribution which a free Suez Canal would make to mankind, given in figures by the Senator from Utah a few moments ago, in the removal of its charges upon the world's traffic, would amount in the course of two or three years to more than all the subsidies which have been referred to during this debate.

Mr. President, I am not going to elaborate this proposition. I have not the time. I read into the RECORD on the 10th day of April the articles of Admiral Evans upon this vastly important subject. He exhausted the proposition, and I trust that Senators who are interested in the proposition will read what he said. I believe they will come to the conclusion which I reached through that channel of information long before this question became an acute one.

Mr. President, whether we repeal this law or not, whether it remains upon the statute books or whether it is to be taken from them, the great problem of cheap coast-to-coast traffic in its material bearings and consequence to the people will find no solution. That must come from another source. The Government of the United States has long operated, through a private company, it is true, but nevertheless operated and controlled, a fleet of merchant vessels plying between its own ports and Panama. It has demonstrated its power as a business factor in the building of the Panama Canal, in the operation of hundreds of miles of telegraph and telephone lines in Alaska, in the spread of the railway system in the Philippines.

Mr. President, if this canal, so far as domestic commerce is affected, is to bring that benefit which we all hope for, and which it was designed to bring, the Government of the United States should build its own line of merchant marine, should operate its own vessels, and by that means place and keep freights and traffic to the level which they ought to occupy. The canal should, of course, be free for private-owned vessels. Those of the Government will not operate at a loss, and there will be traffic for all. The Government vessels will be the regulator, free from combinations and conferences, yet just to consumers and competitors alike.

Mr. President, I do not know how long it may be, I believe this policy will come in time, and the canal will have subserved its purposes, and posterity will rejoice that our money has been expended in the establishment of a highway that serves the people because they operate as well as control it.

Mr. President, we do not tax commerce generally for purposes of revenue. That canal was not constructed as an investment. Reference has been made to $700,000,000 which has been expended by this Government in improving rivers and harbors. Do we levy a single dollar of tax upon any commerce for the use of the improvements which are represented by this expenditure? Why should we make an exception of this our greatest achievement? Why should we exempt it from that general policy of operation which is characteristic of our expenditures for the improvement of navigation?

The great Ambrose Channel, constructed at an enormous expense, is useful only for foreign vessels. There is not a ship flying the American flag which needs that channel. It is and was made necessary in order that the greater craft of other nations engaged in international commerce might reach the wharves of the city of New York. That is only one of many instances I might mention in support of the proposition that a tax should not be levied by this country upon that commerce which represents transportation. So we are not departing from any old policy, we are not establishing any strange policy, we are not branching out in a new line of endeavor, when I plead for free tolls for all, but we are merely carrying out the general plan which has long characterized our expenditures for these great purposes.

Mr. President, I want to say a word with reference to our coastwise traffic, and here I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and I will agree. Much has been said concerning the vast importance to its future which this bill carries. It is said that if repeal shall be effected this commerce will dwindle and decay. On the other hand, it is asserted that if the law remains it will expand by leaps and bounds.

I do not believe, I can not bring my mind to believe, that the enactment of this measure or its repeal can influence it in any way. Our coastwise traffic is a monopoly. Ninety-two per cent of it is controlled as completely and as absolutely as the Standard Oil Co. ever controlled the markets of the country. It is the necessary and legitimate consequence of our navigation laws. Years ago we bound up our coastwise commerce as Chinese bind the feet of their women, restricting growth and compelling and forcing it along certain lines. We could not, if we had deliberately so intended, have legislated more effectively for the creation, for the necessary creation, of monopoly in any line of business than in the navigation laws and their application to coastwise traffic. It is not the tolls act which should concern us, but the code of laws of which this crushing monopoly is the lusty and legitimate offspring.

The way, Mr. President, to relieve ourselves of this monopoly is to repeal these laws, set them aside, and open our coastwise traffic to the competitive conditions which the coastwise traffic of the other great nations has long encountered.

Do you tell me that you can not compete? I deny it, Mr. President. But monopolies are odious, and this monopoly should disappear.

Now, it is claimed that another provision in this treaty excludes this shipping from the canal, and it is therefore not concerned in repeal; but we know, Mr. President, that man never yet enacted a statute that the cunning of man could not avoid. Human ingenuity is not proof against human ingenuity, and the most patient and experienced constructor of statutes knows full well that exemptions and exceptions in the hands of skillful men are merely obstructions and difficulties naturally expected, but which can be climbed over or tunneled through.

The exemption clause subserves a good purpose. I fear it will be effective only so long as, and no longer than, this monopoly determines to break through it. Then in all probability an assumed dissolution of combinations or sales of railway interests will take place, and the old form garbed in a new dress will snap its fingers under the nose of the statute.

Mr. President, my amendment is entirely harmonious with the Baltimore platform. That document is giving our Republican friends much concern, and I am anxious, as far as I can, to calm their apprehensions concerning it. And I am also anxious to observe its requirements, since it must govern my action in the premises.

Mr. President, I am both pleased and surprised at the solicitude which our Republican brethren display concerning this party pledge and their anxious demand for its observance. I can not but contrast it with the exhibition of solicitude when the tariff bill was before this body for consideration, which then, however, ran in the contrary direction. We were then warned that if we observed our party obligation we would ruin the country and ourselves. We are now warned that if we violate our party obligation the same results will inevitably follow. It is a sad position to put our party in. "We shall and we shan't, and we will and we won't. We'll be damned if we do, and we'll be damned if we don't." We have, according to our Republican brethren, already put ourselves beyond the pale of possible success by disregarding their earnest protest and keeping the faith in one direction. Notwithstanding that, we are about to bring upon our heads additional disaster by breaking faith in the present instance. Verily the pathway we tread is full of thorns.

But, Mr. President, aside from this pleasantry, let me say that I am not prepared to accept the assurance that the adoption of this plank of the platform was the thoughtless, ill-considered act of the party to which I belong. I must assume that the platform was carefully prepared and carefully considered, and that the statesmen who framed it were quite as well acquainted then with the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as they are at present.

Twice in my State have I broken with my party, Mr. President, because of my insistence upon the observation of party pledges. I concede fully that where a party platform contains inconsistent provisions it is impossible for one to comply with all of them, and that it is essential that a choice be made between that which must be followed and that which must be disregarded. There are some differences, perhaps unreconcilable, in our platform, as there are frequently inconsistencies in some well-considered statutes.

But I can perceive no inconsistency here. If I could bring my mind to believe that this exemption was a subsidy, I should feel as most of my colleagues do, and act accordingly. I do not criticize; I rather commend them for their attitude, for they are governed, as I must be, by my convictions of duty. I may be obtuse, Mr. President, but this exemption does not measure up to my definition of a subsidy. If it is a subsidy, then we have voted subsidy upon subsidy in the legislation of the present Congress, as in that of its predecessors. We have subsidized every man whose income is less than $3,000 a year; we have subsidized the American merchant marine by giving it a discrimination of 5 per cent on all the traffic of American bottoms; we have subsidized our merchant marine passing through the Sault Canal; we have subsidized the vessels of all nations which utilize the Ambrose Channel and enjoy the benefits of our chain of lighthouses, our buoys, and our harbor privileges.

I regard a subsidy as something enjoyed by a certain class of people who are a small part of a larger class. For example, the International Steamship Co.—I believe that is the name of it—is subsidized by the Government of the United States in the guise of payment for carriage of the mails. No other ships plying between the same ports are subsidized. Everyone can engage in the coastwise traffic who can build a ship and sustain the competition, thus availing themselves of a common privilege. As a consequence, it is a sort of free-for-all, in so far as freedom can be said to be consistent with the existence of a great monopoly. Hence I am unable to share the view, much as I respect the convictions and argument and logic of others, that this is a subsidy as I understand the meaning of that word. Mr. Taft and many other gentlemen declare it to be one. They may be right, but I must be the judge so far as my own action is concerned.

Mr. President, a party pledge solemnly given should be binding. It should be observed in the absence of any supremely controlling reason for its disregard. Being unable to perceive any conflict between this and our other pledges, I feel that when the Baltimore convention committed the Democratic Party to this exemption I have no authority to disregard its obligations.

I say frankly—and my views have undergone a profound change with reference to the general subject—that were it not for the expression of my party upon the proposition I should not hesitate to vote for repeal, and do so with the full approval of a matured judgment.

I hope my amendment will receive the consideration which I think it deserves, because it will confer a great economic benefit upon the people of this country, and incidentally upon all the nations. And I am unable to see why any exemption should be made which is not absolute. Surely if there is to be a limitation it should apply not in favor of a monopoly, but of those who are in competition with the world for the commerce of all the nations.

Mr. President, I have not attemptd a logical and systematic discussion of canal tolls. I have merely sought to present, crudely, perhaps, but nevertheless to present, the conclusions which I have reached from my considerations of this important measure, together with some of the reasons for entertaining them.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for a very few minutes in reference to a matter in which I feel a deep interest.

I have noted recent statements in the daily press opposing the prohibition amendment to the National Constitution. The statements to which I refer invoke the doctrine of State rights and local self-government against the national amendment.

I regard as almost blasphemous the attempt to invoke the sacred principles of State rights and local self-government for the protection of the liquor traffic. There ought to be no such thing in county, State, or Nation as a right to authorize the liquor traffic. There should be no such thing as a right to authorize a wrong. Those who urge the doctrine of State rights against national prohibition say in effect that they are entirely willing that the liquor traffic shall flourish in this Nation as long as a single State desires it. The liquor interests in this country would go wild with joy if every prohibitionist would take that view. It would mean their perpetuation. It would mean that from their strongholds in one State or a few States they would continue to pour a tide of corruption over all the land. In some States the liquor traffic is impregnably intrenched. I do not underrate the value of State, county, and precinct prohibition. These are infinitely better than no prohibition at all. But the liquor traffic spreads from a few centers all over the country; its ramifications are everywhere. It is a national as well as a local evil, and its power is so tireless and so terrible that the Nation will never be safe as long as it flourishes in even one or a few States. It is certainly to be regretted that the doctrine of State rights should be invoked in behalf of the liquor traffic, which is universally recognized as the most conscienceless violator of State rights the country has ever known. The liquor traffic persistently fought interstate liquor legislation by Congress on the ground that the States had no right to interfere with the liquor traffic in the Nation; now it fights the national prohibition amendment on the ground that the Nation has no right to interfere with it in the States.

If the constitutional views of those who urge the State rights principle in this controversy had prevailed in the past, the States that voted against or failed to ratify the Federal income tax or the direct election of Senators would still be exempt from the levy of the tax within their borders, or would still be electing Senators by the legislatures and not by the people. They seem to be seriously alarmed lest the United States Army might be ordered out to suppress a "blind tiger" or capture a "bootlegger" in the event the national amendment should be adopted. The mere statement of such a proposition is its own refutation.

These gentlemen are afraid that if the States get together in a sufficient number, as they have a right to do, and summon their creature, the Federal Government, to join them and cooperate with them in the contest against the liquor traffic that it will mean the death of State governments, the disappearance of State identity. They seem to be afraid that if the States do right in this instance the shock will be so great that they will immediately agree to disband their respective political organizations and all commit suicide together. Nobody will seriously credit such a contention.

Texas proponents of "State rights" in this matter say that we will do well to work our own crop in Texas and let other crops alone. This is the same old guilty cry of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

I announced for nation-wide prohibition in almost every speech I made in my campaign for the senatorial nomination, and I referred specifically to the constitutional amendment pending in Congress. There was no question as to where I stood. In supporting this nation-wide amendment I am but keeping my promises to the people. They are above all caucuses, all officials, and to them alone do I hold myself accountable.

I have heard that there is a formidable movement afoot to commit the Democratic Party against the national amendment. If this movement should succeed, it would affront the moral sense of the Nation and lead the Democracy into a contradiction of one of its most vital principles—the greatest good for the greatest number.

It is proper for me to say here that in my own State, the State of Texas, there is in progress a contest for the governorship and other State offices in which State-wide prohibition is one of the dominant issues. Practically all Texas Democratic prohibitionists are properly behind Hon. Thomas H. Ball for governor, although he is not yet convinced as to the expediency of the national amendment. Let it be said to the credit of Mr. Ball, however, that he made it clear in his opening speech that although he had not aligned himself with the nation-wide movement, he had no confidence in the utterly baseless proposition that the nation-wide amendment contravenes the doctrine of State rights.

As a matter of fact, when three-fourths or more of the States, proceeding under the Constitution, join in summoning their servant, the National Government, to the contest against the Nation's most powerful enemy, the liquor traffic, they are exercising their rights in the highest and most beneficent sense. The nation-wide amendment will provide, in effect, that it shall be enforced in concurrence with the States and not to their exclusion. If the position taken by our friends who are urging the State-rights argument that no further powers shall be given the National Government to meet new conditions is indorsed, then that section of the Constitution providing for its amendment is absolutely meaningless. The proposed amendment contemplates depriving no State of its own power to punish violators of its prohibition laws.

As to the State of Texas, I wish to say that at a great prohibition rally held at Fort Worth early in this year, attended by almost 5,000 representative prohibition Democrats from every section of the State, the nation-wide amendment was unanimously indorsed.

Let me say here that prohibition is a moral and economic issue outside of ordinary party lines, and it should be made a test of no man's fealty to party. Therefore the effort to commit the Democratic Party as a party against nation-wide constitutional prohibition can not be too strongly condemned, and the recent caucus of the Democratic Party in the National House of Representatives acted wisely in not committing itself against the nation-wide movement.

So far as I am concerned, my path is clear. I did not come to the Senate merely to hold the office. Among the things I promised the people to do was to lift my voice against the liquor traffic in the Senate of the United States and to support this nation-wide amendment. Whether my service here be short or long, I shall remain faithful to the people's interest as I am able to see it, and to the people I submit my record.

Mr. President, I ask permission to put in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a brief statement I made before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee on the subject of the nation-wide prohibition constitutional amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to printing in the RECORD the remarks referred to by the Senator from Texas, and which were not made in the Senate? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD, A UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS.

Senator SHEPPARD. Gentlemen of the committee, as the introducer of the national prohibition amendment in the United States Senate (S. J. Res. 88), I desire to preface the hearings you have so kindly granted on this subject with a brief discussion. In the beginning, let me say that the prohibition forces desire the resolution amended by inserting, after the word "power," in line 13, page 2, the words "only in concurrence with the States," our purpose being not to have the Federal Government supplant the States in handling this question but to cooperate with them.

The liquor traffic is a permanent menace to the Nation. It is the distribution for profit of a habit-producing drug in liquid form, a seductive poison that breaks down the vital processes of the body, destroys the capacity to resist disease, undermines intelligence, strength, and health, impairs the moral sense, composes the chief source of poverty, insanity, feeble-mindedness, sickness, crime, and transmits an hereditary taint that seriously handicaps posterity. It is the enemy of virtue, honor, manhood, all that life holds sacred, all that life holds true. It is diverting from productive channels a sum now approximating two and a quarter billions of dollars every year, representing an ever-growing proportion of the earnings of the people, a sum which would otherwise be used in building and improving homes, in providing for substantial needs such as clothing, food, shoes, other comforts and necessities, for education, for benevolent undertakings of all kinds. It is time for the Nation to act when more money is being spent every year for intoxicating liquors than for bread or for clothes. Such is the power of the drug that men will vote against it, speak against it, pray against it, and then hold out their trembling hands for the glass that damns. Surely it is a short-sighted statesmanship that would permit $2,000,000,000 to be worse than wasted each year in the production of misery and vice and shame in order that the Government might obtain a revenue of two hundred and twenty millions. If this Republic can not live without the dirty dollars it obtains from the liquor traffic, dollars stained with the tears of women and children, it ought not to live. There are legitimate sources of revenue yet untouched. There are few direct taxes on luxuries. The income tax has little more than scratched the surface of enormous wealth. There is no Federal inheritance tax. Nonalcoholic beverages are untaxed. The national domain, with measureless mineral resources, water powers, forests, and the like, could be managed so as to produce a yearly usufruct of fifty or one hundred millions. The pension roll at last gives promise of rapid decline.

The proponents of the national prohibition amendment assert that the American Republic can not endure if the liquor traffic continues to absorb the earnings and the energies of the people—to threaten their moral and material welfare. The annual consumption of wines and liquors now averages about 22 gallons for every man, woman, and child in the United States. We assert that this country can not withstand the economic loss that comes from an annual waste of two and a quarter billions of dollars, a sum more than double the national debt, and from the use of millions of fertile acres for the production of grain and fruit to be rotted into alcohol, but for which these acres would be making bread and meat for the Nation's sustenance. It is an evil transcending the scope of police powers that pertain to the morals, the health, the physical safety of State populations, although it is partially within the scope of such powers. It portends economic disaster for the Nation. The Nation is threatened and the Nation must act. The preservation of the Republic demands that the traffic in intoxicating liquors shall cease. It is an evil of such proportions and of such character that the Nation must take part in the struggle against it.

This nation-wide prohibition amendment proposes that the Federal Government shall cooperate with the States in the destruction of the liquor traffic. I can not see that it violates in any way the fundamental plan on which our Government was founded or contradicts in any sense the doctrine of State rights. As I understand our history, the Federal Government is the creature of the States and possesses only such powers as are expressly or impliedly delegated by the States. I do not understand that the States are unable to delegate any further powers than those they conferred when the Constitution was originally framed. Whenever it appears to three-fourths of the States that the welfare of the country demands that additional functions should be delegated to the General Government, such States have the power and the right to delegate such functions through proper constitutional processes on such conditions as they deem proper and the whole performance is in consonance with the true theory of American Government. By this amendment the American people, speaking through the Federal Government, their only collective mouthpiece in a governmental sense, will declare that the liquor traffic is an outlaw in every part of the United States, that the Federal Government shall be empowered to enforce such declaration in concurrence and only in concurrence with the States, and that those States which have no laws against the traffic and desire no laws against it have not the right to harbor so frightful a menace to the happiness and prosperity of the Nation. Under this amendment no State will be deprived of the power to legislate against the traffic.

We want the battle to continue in family, precinct, county, State, and Nation. No unit of government or of society is too small, no unit is too large to have a place in the ranks now gathering for this conflict under the banners of Almighty God. The liquor traffic is so firmly intrenched in some sections of the country that national action will be necessary to exterminate it. We are not simply citizens of States. We are Americans above all things else. We can not wrap ourselves in the mantle of a narrow localism. We can not successfully combat national evils by confronting them only in our immediate territory. What would be thought of the man who after apparently conquering the flames in his own room in a hotel would in fancied security sit gravely down to watch the fire devour every other portion of the structure? Let me tell you that if the liquor traffic is permitted to take refuge in one State or in a few States it will be only a matter of time until the whole battle must be refought in every part of the Union.

Let me pay the liquor forces the tribute of saying that they are as shrewd and tireless a set as ever vexed humanity in the cause of evil. They told us when State-wide prohibition was first discussed that the county was the proper unit of local self-government. Now, when Nation-wide prohibition is contemplated, they say the State is the proper unit. They are the most zealous defenders of "local self-government" the world ever saw, but they always make the locality small enough to leave the liquor traffic in operation somewhere beyond its borders. Let prohibitionists be not deceived. The cry of "local self-government" and "State rights" is being raised to-day in the interest of the liquor traffic. Some prohibitionists are being influenced by the cry, but they will soon see the real situation and join their brethren on the fighting line.

An area equal to nearly three-fourths of the national territory containing about half our population has been voted dry, but from its citadels in certain sections the liquor traffic still floods the land with its destructive tide. The consumption of intoxicating liquors is increasing. It was greater last year than ever before. Men, women, and children are succumbing to its pitiless advance. The devastation would be far more rapid but for prohibition in many States and counties, yet it is nevertheless on the increase. State-wide prohibition is good, and we must fight for it at every opportunity. The Webb law is good, and we must preserve it. But not until the American people as a whole unite and acting through their collective Government say that the liquor traffic shall exist nowhere within our borders will the body of this death be permanently lifted.

Gentlemen, it is safe to say that many millions of the American people desire this amendment submitted. Whether you believe in it or not, give the American people a chance to discuss it and to pass upon it. If it should be rejected, one phase of a great issue will have been definitely settled at least for a long period. If it should be adopted, the blessings of heaven will be yours for having aided in securing one of the mightiest reforms of time. We believe that we are entitled to have this tremendous question submitted to the American people acting through the American States. All that we ask is the American privilege and the American right of presenting our cause in the proper forum of American constitutional opinion. [Applause.]

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I believe that many of the people of the United States do not fully appreciate the facts which have justified the United States in refusing to recognize Huerta, in demanding an apology, in taking possession of Vera Cruz, and in massing its forces in preparation for dealing in other ways, perhaps, with Gen. Victoriano Huerta. I feel impelled to present some of the facts which have justified our conduct and which would now justify the United States in demanding and enforcing by arms, if otherwise unavoidable, the restoration of "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people," to the hands of the people of Mexico, and the overthrow of the cruel commercialized military oligarchy now riding the people of Mexico to ruin and chaos.

When Victoriano Huerta usurped the presidency of Mexico by military revolution, February 18, 1913, he found immediate opposition. The legislature of the State of Coahuila passed resolutions instantly supporting Madero (Feb. 19). This resolution made Madero's death expedient to Huerta to prevent organized support of Madero. Madero was killed (Feb. 22, 1913) at once.

It soon became obvious to Huerta that his only chance to hold his power against Carranza and Zapata fighting for the constitution was by exciting a war or some act of aggression by the United States which would enable him through misguided patriotism to rally behind himself the leaders of the constitutionalist movement. Huerta thought he could by exciting their patriotism make them forget or condone his crimes in resisting a common foe and thus get them to support his leadership.

From many quarters since last summer the authorities of the United States have had reason to know of Huerta's wicked purpose against the United States.

Finally, when the unspeakable misconduct of Huerta's administration had not yet moved the United States to take any aggressive action against Huerta, a step was taken by one of Huerta's subordinate officers at Tampico which could not be overlooked or condoned. One of Huerta's subordinate officers, on the 9th of April, 1914, in all human probability instigated by Huerta himself, arrested at Tampico a paymaster of the U. S. S. Dolphin and a boat's crew, all in the uniform of the United States. Our sailors were unarmed and entered Tampico to purchase some gasoline. Two of them were in our boat with the flag of the United States at the bow and the stern of the boat, and upon our own soil under the international law. Our unarmed men, in the uniform of the United States, were then paraded through the streets of Tampico as a public spectacle, subsequently released with an apology from the subordinate officer and later with an expression of regret from Huerta. But Huerta deliberately declined to salute the flag, under the rules of international law, as demanded by the President of the United States, for this international affront and indignity, while he temporized for 10 days with President Wilson, evidently with a view to obtaining a cargo of 250 machine guns and 2,000,000 rounds of ammunition which were expected to arrive by a German merchant ship at Vera Cruz on Tuesday, April 21. The President of the United States gave Huerta until 6 o'clock Sunday night, April 19, to make the amends required by international law. The salute was not made. On Monday, April 20, the President of the United States presented the matter to the Congress of the United States, and Congress passed a resolution as follows:

That the President is justified in the employment of the armed forces of the United States to enforce his demand for unequivocal amends for certain affronts and indignities committed against the United States.

Be it further resolved that the United States disclaims any hostility to the Mexican people or any purpose to make war upon Mexico.

This resolution was justified by a preamble referring to the facts presented by the President in his message to Congress of the 20th of April.

The Senate of the United States, after discussion, voted down a substitute preamble to this resolution, offered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, as follows:

That the state of unrestrained violence and anarchy which exist in Mexico, the numerous unchecked and unpunished murders of American citizens and the spoliation of their property in that country, the impossibility of securing protection or redress by diplomatic methods in the absence of lawful or effective authority, the inability of Mexico to discharge its international obligations, the unprovoked insults and indignities inflicted upon the flag and the uniform of the United States by the armed forces in occupation of large parts of the Mexican territory have become intolerable.

That the self-respect and dignity of the United States and the duty to protect its citizen and its international rights require that such a course be followed in Mexico by our Government as to compel respect and observance of its rights.

Those who voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts I feel sure did not question the truth of the statements in the preamble, but thought it unwise to repeat these grievances for fear that it would lead to immediate war, as the preamble justified immediate intervention and the President had not recommended intervention. The Government of the United States had been sincerely endeavoring in true friendship to use its good offices to restore peace in Mexico without resorting to armed force, hoping that Huerta and his associates would consent to hold an honest election and restore constitutional government in Mexico. This hope has utterly failed, and in the meantime a terrific war is being waged by armies of Mexicans fighting for liberty and demanding constitution and reform.

Mr. President, I voted against the preamble proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, although I fully recognized the truth of its recitations, because I very greatly desired to have an adjustment of the difficulties in Mexico with as little loss of life as possible, and I desired to hold up the hands of the President of the United States in his anxious and patriotic purpose to secure the adjustment of these difficulties peacefully, if possible. But, Mr. President, I wish that the people of the United States and that the people of the world might know that our seizure of Vera Cruz and our demand of Huerta to salute the flag had behind it the most abundant justification, and I think that the world should know what the conditions are which have confronted us on our immediate borders and which not only have justified our extremely moderate and considerate conduct in this matter but which would now justify the United States in demanding the complete restoration of peace and order in Mexico and the reestablishment of liberty and the actual sovereignty of the people of Mexico. The welfare of the whole world depends upon the establishment of the ideals of the Republic of the United States, of "constitutional liberty and order and justice between man and man." The people of the United States do not desire in any degree to control the affairs of the people of Mexico, but I do believe that the people of the United States very greatly desire the restoration of liberty, justice, and constitutional self-government in Mexico, so that the people of Mexico can enjoy the rights of life and liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and enjoy the fruit of their own labors.

The President, in his message to Congress, said:

We do not desire to control in any degree the affairs of our sister Republic. Our feeling for the people of Mexico is one of deep and genuine friendship, and everything that we have so far done or refrained from doing has proceeded from our desire to help them, not to hinder or embarrass them. We would not wish even to exercise the good offices of friendship without their welcome or consent. The people of Mexico are entitled to settle their own domestic affairs in their own way and we sincerely desire to respect their right.

Mr. President, I agree with this generous sentiment and I wish we might assist the people of Mexico to restore orderly government without such enormous destruction of life and property. At present, in the attempt to establish order, a series of daily bloody battles are in progress, with thousands of men being killed on the battlefields of Torreon, Monterey, Tampico, and so forth. The people of Mexico have no way in which to express their opinion but by battle. They have no elections in Mexico which deserve to be called by the name. The last election, of October 26, 1913, was a willful fraud and a corrupt mockery of the people of Mexico, engineered by a military oligarchy, directed by Huerta.

Secret instructions were sent out from Mexico City October 22, 1913, in Huerta's interest to have the votes counted for Huerta and to make the elections void as to the presidency by returning a deficient number of precincts, which, under the Mexican law, would leave Huerta as provisional President, and this was accomplished under Huerta's dictatorship.

Mr. President, the real difficulty in Mexico is the establishment of a commercialized military oligarchy, enjoying every form of privilege and monopoly at the expense of the rights of the people of Mexico, millions of whom are denied the rights of property, of liberty, and of life itself. Under this heartless organization the wages of the people are not sufficient to sustain a civilized human being, provide food and shelter, much less provide any opportunity for instruction or for human progress. It is the same condition which caused the great French Revolution in 1789. The murder in Mexico of American citizens, and of Englishmen and of Germans and of Frenchmen and of Spaniards, and the wholesale robbery and destruction of property under the lawless conditions which have ensued from this primary cause are merely details of an unavoidable result. The usurpation and violence of Huerta, his insult to our flag and uniform, are details of the egregious crime against humanity which this commercialized military oligarchy of Huerta and his friends represent. The killing of thousands in Mexico City when Huerta treacherously overthrew Madero is only a detail of this criminal system.

Mr. President, the remedy for this condition is not from the top down; it is from the bottom up. Liberty, freedom, and equal rights are not bestowed by the powerful few on the many as an act of grace and justice, but are established by the many by the ballot, or, where the ballot is denied, at the point of the sword. This was done at Runnymede, when the Magna Charta was wrested from the hands of John. This was done in France, over a hundred years ago, when Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette were dethroned. This was done by the American colonists when we set up the Government of the United States. The common people established liberty in France, in England, and in the United States. And this will be done in Mexico at the cannon's mouth, by the armies of the common Mexican people demanding the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. My sympathies are with the common people of Mexico. I want them to govern themselves, and I desire that the United States shall give a friendly hand to those who seek to establish constitutional government in Mexico.

They say that Gen. Francisco Villa, leading the constitutionalist armies, has been a horse thief, a bandit, a robber, a killer of men. It may be true, for Villa was only an ignorant, unlearned peon, whose sister was ruined by a Cientifico. Villa, I understand, when 18 years of age, killed the betrayer of his sister, and took to the mountains to save his own life, in a country where the rights of a peon were little better than the rights of a wolf. The hand of society was against Villa, and Villa made war on society. But Villa, whatever his sins of the past, is now waging a humane warfare, as he has recently learned it out of a volume given him by an American officer.

Villa, at all events, is now demanding the constitution and reform. Villa, at all events, avows his friendship for the United States and its wise policies. Villa, at all events, has taken his own life in his hands and is leading thousands of other common men in the demand for the overthrow of the usurping despot, Huerta, for the overthrow of the entire system represented by Huerta of a commercialized, military oligarchy, and the establishment of constitutional government; and in this enterprise I hope for the reestablishment of the constitution and honest government, trusting and believing that neither Villa nor Carranza, nor the men fighting with them, will ever stand for the restoration in any other form of the evil system which they are gladly shedding their blood to terminate.

I wish to show that we are justified, not by our own grievances alone, but by the grievances of Englishmen, Germans, Frenchmen, Spaniards, and above all, perhaps, by the grievances of the unhappy people of Mexico, whose liberties, whose property rights, and whose lives have been, and are now, at the mercy of an armed military oligarchy, led by Huerta; that no man's life is safe in Mexico, that no man's property is safe in Mexico, that no man, whether he be Mexican, American, Englishman, German, Frenchman, or Spaniard, has any safety in his life or his property under the criminal rule of this usurping military despot, who has declared himself vested with legislative, judicial, and executive power over the people of Mexico.

Until Diaz established his military control of Mexico and carried on a halfway benevolent commercial despotism there were 52 dictators, Presidents, and rulers in 59 years in Mexico. The Encyclopedia Britannica on Mexico, describing the causes of their difficulties, says that the—

CAUSE OF THE PRESENT REVOLUTION IS THE PRIVILEGED CLASSES VERSUS THE PEOPLE.

It says:

Thenceforward, till the second election of Porfirio Diaz to the presidency in 1884, the history of Mexico is one of almost continuous warfare in which Maximilian's empire is a mere episode. The conflicts, which may at first sight seem to be merely between rival generals, are seen upon closer examination to be mainly (1) between the privileged classes, i. e., the church and (at times) the army, and the mass of the other civilized population; (2) between Centralists and Federalists, the former being identical with the army, the church, and the supporters of despotism, while the latter represent the desire for republicanism and local self-government.

On both sides in Mexico there was an element consisting of honest doctrinaires; but rival military leaders exploited the struggles in their own interest, sometimes taking each side successively; and the instability was intensified by the extreme poverty of the peasantry, which made the soldiery reluctant to return to civil life, by the absence of a regular middle class, and by the concentration of wealth in a few hands, so that a revolutionary chief was generally sure both of money and of men. But after 1884, under the rule of Diaz, the Federal system continued in name, but it concealed in fact, with great benefit to the nation, a highly centralized administration, very intelligent, and on the whole both popular and successful—a modern form of rational despotism.

Porfirio Diaz's reign was "popular and successful" in a certain narrow sense. It exploited the great riches of Mexico, it established many monopolies, it maintained order by killing those who dared resist the unsound system, but it eventuated in the only possible result of glorifying property accumulation and making millionaires on the one hand and on the other hand in the result of reducing the mass of the people to abject poverty, of preventing the mass of the people being educated, of preventing the mass of the people having a reasonable opportunity to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The Diaz régime or system magnified property rights at the expense of and by minimizing human rights. The necessary results of the Diaz system was his flight to avoid assassination and the succeeding tragedies we have recently been witnessing.

The people of the United States are industrious and kind-hearted, with high ideals of liberty and human brotherhood and a resolute purpose not to interfere with the liberty of others.

The great body of the people of the United States do not wish to acquire the territory now occupied by the Mexican people and do not wish to exercise any political authority over them or their affairs.

All men know, Mr. President, that when nations become involved in the violent excitement of war, when thousands of men are killed on either side, and tens of thousands are wounded, and these terrible evils sending grief to homes in every section are exaggerated, there spring up demands for indemnity and reparation that would not be made in moments of more sober reflection. If, therefore, the United States should be impelled by the unhappy conditions in Mexico to intervene, we should, in my opinion, declare to the world that we will not, under any circumstances, take any of the territory now occupied by Mexico.

We should do more than this—we should declare the true, plain, honest motives which inspire the people of the United States in its present attitude. And these reasons should be such as to fully justify the American Nation before the thoughtful opinion of the people of other civilized nations.

The United States is already more than abundantly justified in declaring armed intervention in Mexico, although the President has not done more than he has deemed necessary to bring about an adjustment with as little force and loss of life as possible. I am glad that the authorities of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile have been accepted as mediators between the United States and the military oligarchy which has usurped the right of sovereignty of the Mexican people, although I am not willing to appear to believe that any agreement with Huerta would have any value whatever unless backed by a cannon or to appear to believe he wishes an honorable adjustment.

It must be kept clearly in mind that our difficulty in Mexico is not, in reality, whether or not Victoriano Huerta, who has declared himself dictator at Mexico City, and who is at the head of an organized army, pretending to represent the Mexican people, shall fire 21 guns in salute to our flag. Our difficulty lies much deeper than this.

Mexico, under the form of a Republic, established a liberal constitution in 1853, an abstract of which I submit as Exhibit I. It will be observed that this constitution, in Title I, section 1, declares "That in the Republic all are born free," and yet the Mexican people are enslaved by cruel commercial and political monopoly, and peonage is found everywhere through Mexico. No man is really free in Mexico.

This constitution declares that instruction is free, and yet the great masses of the people have had no free instruction. And all of the other assurances and guaranties of the constitution have been gradually ignored until no man's life or property is really safe in Mexico. Fifteen millions of Mexicans are substantially denied the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and the bloodiest fratricidal strife has ensued from this evil cause.

The constitution, in Title I, section 1, guarantees the right of petition, and yet when the House of Delegates of the Congress of the Republic of Mexico petitioned Huerta for protection of the lives of the members of Congress, he immediately answered this petition by arresting and throwing into the penitentiary all the delegates who so petitioned—110 in number—on October 9, 1913.

Title I, section 1, article 13, provides that no one shall be tried according to special laws, or by special tribunals, and yet this military oligarchy had killed and imprisoned thousands, including American citizens and consuls, contrary to the constitution. In the prison of San Juan de Uluo, at Vera Cruz, our officers found 325 Mexican men imprisoned without trial, without accusation, by the Huerta military despotism, merely because they were unwilling to enlist as soldiers to support this wicked power. All of the personal guaranties have been ignored. Article 22 forbids mutilation, torture, yet the San Juan de Uluo furnishes overwhelming testimony of the violation of this constitutional provision.

Article 23 declares the penalty of death abolished for political offenses, except treason and murder in the first degree, and yet President Madero, declared elected as the President of the Republic of Mexico, and Vice President Suarez, elected Vice President of the Republic of Mexico, were arrested, their resignations commanded, under the threat of immediate death, and they were immediately killed, and a false account of the killing published to the world, and no judicial investigation ever held as promised to the diplomats representing all nations of the world.

Title I, section 1, article 28, declares that there shall be no monopolies of any kind, whether governmental or private (inventions excepted), and yet for the last 40 years one monopolistic concession after another has been granted, giving monopolies innumerable to private persons—monopolies in agricultural lands, monopolies in grazing lands, monopolies in timber lands, monopolies in oil lands—and it is an open secret that the oil monopolies have given huge sums in substantial bribery of the leading officials of the Mexican Government.

Monopoly has become so complete in Mexico that millions of human beings, willing to labor, own no land upon which they may labor. The same cruel and intolerable conditions of land monopoly described by Thomas Jefferson as existing in France immediately before the French Revolution exist in Mexico today, and make revolution absolutely unavoidable—make revolution absolutely inextinguishable until this crime against human life be corrected and the right of human beings to live shall be recognized and provided. The demand of the Zapatistas is for land upon which the peasantry can support life. These conditions have led to the war by Carranza, Villa, and the constitutionalists. This was the demand which Russia had to heed with her peasantry—and from which was born "Nihilism" and "Anarchism." It is the right of land to live on that caused the unending revolution of the Irish against their alien landlords and the evil policy of government that tolerated and maintained the system.

When all the land is held in the hands of the few, enabling them to dictate the conditions of life upon the millions of people who have no land, enabling them to dictate the political conditions and to seize by force, by fraud, by artifice, and craft the government powers of the common people of Mexico, and then to use the organized powers of the common people against the common people themselves and against their interests, chaos and ruin is the unavoidable consequence.

The people of Mexico are enslaved, yet Title I, section 1, article 39 declares that the sovereignty is in the people, that all public power emanates from the people. And yet, the right of sovereignty of 15,000,000 Mexican people is usurped by Huerta and the military oligarchy that surrounds him. The sovereignty of the people is supposed to be exercised through representatives honestly chosen in fair elections, yet the election on the 26th of October, 1913, was a mockery. Secret instructions had been sent out from Mexico City to make a false return of the votes in favor of Huerta and to make the returns defective in order to throw the presidential office in the hands of the Congress elected as of that date, the preceding Congress being still incarcerated in the penitentiary by Huerta's order. I submit the names of those still confined in the penitentiary November 15, 1913.

Members of the Mexican Congress put in the penitentiary by Victoriano Huerta on October 10 for having dared to pass a resolution to investigate the sudden disappearance of Senator Dominguez, of Chiapas, and demanding safeguard of their own lives by Huerta and still incarcerated on November 13, 1913:

Many of these men were still in the penitentiary when the United States seized Vera Cruz, April 20, 1914.

By Title I, section 3, foreigners have the same guaranties of life, liberty, and the possession of property. Yet large numbers of foreigners have been killed without any adjustment or diplomatic settlement being made, and hundreds of millions of property belonging to foreigners have been impaired, destroyed, or taken without compensation.

All nations should be patient with another nation torn by civil strife, and where the constituted authorities are doing what they can to establish order and justice; but Huerta's own evil conduct is the cause of these disorders in Mexico.

The constitution of Mexico divides the powers of government into legislative, executive, and judicial, yet Huerta, on the 10th of October, 1913, destroyed the legislative branch and threw the Congress in the penitentiary by military force, invested himself by decree with legislative power and with judicial power, in open and flagrant violation of the constitution which he had sworn to support.

Mr. President, Mexico is upon our immediate borders; our boundary line touches Mexico for near 2,000 miles.

Upon the invitation of the constitution of Mexico, very many thousands of our citizens, who are entitled to the protection of this Government, entered Mexico and invested hundreds of millions of property. Their property has been despoiled, their lives have been taken without redress, and now they are all fleeing or fled from Mexico for the purpose of saving life itself and we, responsible to them and for them before the whole world, with abundant power to protect them, stand face to face with a military despot whose conduct has made their flight imperative, but whose conduct against them and against us is a mild offense compared to his crime against the common people of Mexico, whose Government, such as it was, he overthrew by military force and usurped on the 18th of February, 1913.

We all remember, Mr. President, his boastful telegram to President Taft, February 19, 1913, that he had overthrown the Mexican Government.

Huerta has been trying to unite behind himself all the revolutionary forces of Mexico, and in order to accomplish that he has been trying to force the United States to an invasion of Mexico. He was openly charged with this on the floor of the Mexican Senate by Senator Dominguez, senator from Chiapas, on the 23d of September, 1913. He wished to cause intervention in a form sufficiently mild that he could use the invasion as an appeal to the patriotism of the Mexican military leaders of all revolutionary factions and secure their cooperation without having intervention go so far as to capture Mexico City and compel a restoration of order and the reestablishment of the power of the common people of Mexico in the exercise of their acknowledged constitutional sovereignty. He would, however, much prefer being a prisoner of the United States than being prisoner of Villa or Zapata, both of whom have sworn his death for treason.

Mr. President, the United States would be justified in intervening for the purpose of protecting the rights of life and property of American citizens in Mexico. The United States would be justified in protecting the rights of Englishmen, Germans, Frenchmen, and Spaniards, whose Governments look to us for their protection. The United States would be justified, in order to end the bloody fratricidal strife and restore order and peace and constitutional government on our border.

Mr. President, the United States has borne repeated injuries week after week, month after month, and year after year, awaiting diplomatic adjustment, until at last, in lieu of adjusting these immediate grievances which are of record in our Department of State and which I shall not pause to enumerate as they would fill a volume of themselves, it finally comes to the point where Huerta, with growing indifference and contempt for the rights of the American people, and in view of saving his own life by forced American intervention, permits—if he did not instigate—an international insult to the flag and uniform of the United States, and then refused redress under the rules of international law.

The world should understand that while the United States regards the insult to its flag and uniform with great gravity and is justified in demanding proper amends for this open affront and indignity before the eyes of the world, nevertheless beyond the flag incident is a long series of grievances which the United States has been trying in vain to adjust by diplomatic process. And the world should understand further that the killing of our citizens in Mexico, the destruction of the property of our citizens in Mexico, the killing of Germans and Englishmen and Spaniards in Mexico, and the destruction of their property, for whose adjustment the United States is held morally responsible and for which the United States has anxiously desired a settlement as the nearest friend of the people of Mexico, are all factors in determining the attitude of the people of the United States.

The world should remember that this multitude of individual grievances, which has been impossible of adjustment, is due to an unstable condition of government in Mexico; that the unhappy people of Mexico, judged by their own constitution, have no government; that all constitutional guaranties in the country under the military control of Huerta have been overthrown; that the constitution of Mexico has been trampled in the dust by military power, by treason, by murder; and that the instances of which we complain—of the murder of our citizens and of the citizens of other nations and the destruction of their property—will be indefinitely continued until a stable form of government is established in Mexico. The whole civilized world has a right to complain at the ruinous slavery imposed upon the people of Mexico by the monopolies which have invaded Mexico in defiance of the constitution of Mexico—monopolies in land, minerals, timber, water powers, government supplies, down to monopolies in gambling and female prostitution—granted to a favored few who by bribery and corruption have secured these favors from the dishonest officials who have misgoverned Mexico under the form of a Republic but in sober truth as a commercialized military oligarchy during the last 40 years.

This criminal oligarchy has not been content with establishing a monopoly of all the opportunities of making a living by the labor of men; it has not been content with the commercial slavery of the people of Mexico and reducing them to peonage, but through the commercial and financial power they have established a corrupt political monopoly of the governing powers which they have concentrated in Mexico City. The power of the sovereign States of Mexico has been invaded, so that Huerta, as the President of Mexico, has not hesitated to set aside governors elected by the people and in their places put military governors; and while Title III declares the supreme power of the federation as divided for its exercise into legislative, executive, and judicial, and that never can two or more of these powers be united in one person or corporation, nor the legislative power be vested in one individual, Huerta, by his own decree of October 10, 1913, vested in his one person legislative, executive, and judicial power in flat violation of the constitution of the people of Mexico.

Mr. President, the real basis of all the difficulties in Mexico is the stealing from the people of Mexico their constitutional rights and retaining the stolen goods by military force. The real difficulty in Mexico is the usurpation of the power of the common people of Mexico by a military oligarchy, pretending to represent the people. Under such conditions there is the absolute certainty that no change from one dictator to another dictator will provide any true remedy so long as the head of this military group, whether Porfirio Diaz, De la Barra, Madero, Lascurain (who was President for a few minutes), or Huerta or the next successful general belonging to Huerta's group who arrests him and puts him to death, will cure the evil in Mexico. The real remedy required in Mexico is to restore to the hands of the people of Mexico their right of self-government, to demand a secret, honest election system, decentralization of power, restoration to the several States of Mexico of the right to manage their own business in their own way under the constitution of Mexico. A constitutional convention is necessary in Mexico to decentralize its powers and to enable the people to exercise safeguarded self-government and to abolish by law the monopolies which have reduced to abject poverty 15,000,000 Mexicans and given stupendous wealth to a few thousand families in Mexico.

I have the faith to believe that the people of Mexico will pass the proper laws for their own protection and for the overthrow of monopoly if they are given an opportunity and that they will establish laws based upon economic and political justice, just as the people of France did.

It was the fishwomen of France, it was the peasantry of France, it was the uneducated, unlearned, common herd in France, despised by the nobility of France, who sang the Marseillaise in the streets of Paris, and who deposed Louis and Marie Antoinette and established in France a Government that recognized the great principles of the French Revolution—liberty, equality, fraternity; and the same spirit is in Mexico now. These people are willing to lay down their lives for liberty, and they are sacrificing their lives wholesale, and they must not be despised,

I know that there have been those who, observing the military despotism that has been parading in Mexico as a Republic, insist that the people of that country are ignorant and unpatriotic, but I have no fears for the people of Mexico. But, Mr. President, I remind you and I remind the Senate that this commercialized military oligarchy made every effort to establish an alliance with Japan at a time when we were having difficulty with Japan over the California case. Such an alliance would bring in its train the most serious consequences for the United States. To permit on our borders such an irresponsible Government as that of Huerta, controlled merely by corrupt avarice and ambition, carries with it danger to the welfare of the people of the United States far greater than the danger involved in now throwing Huerta out of power in Mexico. Have we forgotten his invitation to the officers of the Japanese vessel Idzuma, his week of feasting and ostentatious demonstration of excessive affection for the Japanese, at a time when he was stirring the passion and prejudice of the populace of Mexico against the American people?

When the people of Mexico really govern Mexico, under constitutional safeguards, just as our people in the 48 States govern their affairs, there will be no danger whatever from the Mexican Government. They will be our friends, knowing that we are in truth the friends of the Mexican people. Moreover, in intervening in Mexico for the establishment of peace, for the pacification of that unhappy country, for the restoration of order, for the reestablishment of liberty and for that purpose alone; when we declare to the people of the whole world that we have no desire to acquire any part of the territory of Mexico, that we do not wish to govern them, but only wish that they shall have the right in peace, in honor, in dignity, to govern themselves, by choosing their own officials in safeguarded, honest elections, we will do more than make a lasting friend of the people of Mexico; we will give the most satisfying assurances to all of the South American Republics of the uprightness of our purposes. We will thus assure every country on the Western Hemisphere that we are moved alone by purposes of unselfish humanity; we will set the standard before the whole world of a high purpose to maintain the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and to promote the great principle of the brotherhood of man.

Our great Republic is founded on the ideal of human liberty, on the idea of freedom.

Over the magnificent entrance of Union Station in our Capital, where tens of thousands pass, is inscribed in granite this noble sentiment:

> Sweetener of hut and of hall,
> Bringer of life out of naught,
> Freedom, oh! fairest of all
> The daughters of time and of thought.

On our gold and silver coins, from 1795 to this day, we have stamped the word "liberty," and the Goddess of Liberty and the liberty cap and the crowned head of Liberty. Our Constitution bristles with it, and every State and every county and every city and every town and every village and church and every school and home teaches it as the foundation of human safety and happiness and progress. It is the ideal of the Western Hemisphere. On all the coins of the Argentine Republic, of Chile, of Colombia, of Ecuador, of Peru, of Uruguay, of Venezuela, of Bolivia, of Honduras and Guatemala, and Mexico "liberty," in some form, is stamped upon the coins and carried in the pockets of the common people and is cherished in their hearts as the highest ideal of the great Western Hemisphere.

Brazil freed her slaves without bloodshed before 1860 because of the love of her people for liberty.

The people of the Argentine Republic and of Chile erected a statue of Christ, the Prince of Peace, on their joint border line as a lasting memorial of the peace and brotherhood of the people of the two Republics. This statue, unveiled March 13, 1904, was cast out of bronze from old cannon belonging to the two countries.

The great liberty bell that sounded the cry of liberty on July 4, 1776, cast in London in 1752 and recast in 1753 in Philadelphia, bears the prophetic words: "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land to all the inhabitants thereof."

A hundred years later, in 1886, the people of France, who love liberty and who established liberty in France by the French Revolution, presented to the people of the United States the magnificent statue of "Liberty enlightening the world," which our people erected on a giant granite pedestal, where it holds out at the entrance of New York Harbor a blazing torch over 300 feet high, where all the world shall see and do honor to "liberty."

Mr. President, the ideals of all the Western Hemisphere have been torn down by Huerta and the corrupt commercial forces behind him which created him and of which he is a mere instrumentality. He symbolizes corrupt commercialism, monopoly, concessions unearned, using the property and powers of the common people not for their betterment but to their ruin and the death of liberty.

The conditions in Mexico are absolutely unendurable. Our national principles and our national safety are endangered. The welfare of all the North and South American countries would be jeopardized unless liberty and freedom shall be restored to the people of Mexico under constitutional safeguards.

The long triumph of bribery and corruption and military force over the judicial, the legislative, and the executive powers of the unhappy people of Mexico has finally led directly to open treason and the overthrow of even the forms of constitutional government and has led to the establishment of an irresponsible military oligarchy and despotism. Men of great intelligence have been led by avarice and greed and ambition through corrupt processes to monopolize and commercialize the political powers of the people of Mexico through a group of unwise and short-sighted Mexican leaders who have been willing to see the governing powers of the people of Mexico fraudulently controlled and the great values of the lands of Mexico diverted to private hands through monopoly.

Military despotism is now in control of Mexico, with all constitutional guaranties overthrown.

If military revolution is permitted by treason and murder to usurp the governing powers of the people of Mexico, if freedom is thus destroyed by monopoly in Mexico, if liberty is thus slain before our very eyes that avarice and greed may rule the land through a military despotism, overthrowing the civil law, then, Mr. President, the whole of America is in peril.

Powers similar to and to some extent the same that have corrupted Mexico and destroyed constitutional government are busy in Colombia, in Venezuela, and in some of the other Republics of North and South America, and the establishment of a military, commercial despotism in Mexico, if successful, would constitute a precedent, the danger of which should not be ignored.

I congratulate the world that neither the United States, nor Argentina, nor Brazil, nor Chile recognize the military despot who, by treason, seized the governing power of the people of Mexico and by fraud has retained it.

It is well known that the Government of Porfirio Diaz was a military despotism under the color of a Republic, yet, in the main, was conducted apparently with a view to developing the resources of Mexico and of protecting life, at least where submission was rendered to his Government.

Finally, the conditions developed by Porfirio Diaz in establishing innumerable monopolies throughout Mexico by concession of various kinds led to a state of unrest and a dangerous revolutionary sentiment that made it necessary for him to leave Mexico and live in Europe. His conduct was practical flight from imminent danger of revolutionary assassination.

He left his successor ad interim—De la Barra—and Madero was elected as an avowed progressive candidate, professing, at least, the patriotic purpose of reform. He was elected through the defective electoral machinery of Mexico, but his weak Government was soon overthrown by the old commercial oligarchy and its secret allies and sympathizers by mutiny and conspiracy.

On February 9, 1913, at 7 o'clock in the morning, Felix Diaz, who had procured a mutiny among the troops of Madero, escaped, by collusion, from the penitentiary and immediately organized an assault on Madero's Government, with the cooperation of several thousand of Madero's troops. Gen. Huerta was in charge of Madero's troops at the palace, and Gen. Blanquet, at present the right-hand man of Gen. Huerta, was next in importance of Madero's generals. The loyalty of both Huerta and Blanquet was already questioned.

De la Barra and Huerta were, on February 10, already in consultation for the purpose of effecting some arrangement, and Diaz was quoted on February 10 as hoping for a good issue from the negotiations being carried on with Gen. Huerta. Blanquet's troops deserted to Diaz. Huerta carried on warfare with Diaz by day and was having secret conferences with his representatives by night.

Finally, on February 17, Huerta stated that the plans were fully matured to remove Madero. Blanquet's guns were turned toward Chapultepec. Blanquet's troops were put in charge of the national palace, and the troops friendly to Madero were put outside of the palace by Huerta, Madero's commanding general.

On February 18, at 2 p. m., Huerta, the sworn commander of Madero's troops, had Blanquet arrest his chief, the elected President of the Republic, Madero, and the Vice President, Suarez, and the entire Cabinet. At the same time Gustavo Madero, the brother of the President, was arrested and immediately afterwards killed.

On February 15, Pedro Lascurain, secretary of foreign relations, appeared in the hall of the committees of the Chamber of Deputies of the Congress of Mexico and falsely represented that the American ambassador had expressed his positive opinion that 3,000 United States marines would immediately come to the City of Mexico to protect the lives and interests of Americans as well as other foreigners residing there.

This was done in order to force Madero's resignation, but Madero refused to resign. The following action was taken in the Mexican Senate:

(Appendix No. 1.)

SPECIAL SESSION HELD FEBRUARY 15, 1913, IN THE HALL OF COMMITTEES OF THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES, SENATOR JUAN C. FERNANDEZ, PRESIDING.

* * * Upon the reading of the inserted dispatch being finished, Mr. Pedro Lascurain, secretary of foreign relations, appeared and was granted the floor for the purpose of reporting. Mr. Lascurain stated that the international situation of Mexico was extremely critical with respect to the United States of America, for telegrams have been received from Washington conveying the decision of that Government, already being carried out, to send warships to Mexico territorial waters of the Gulf and of the Pacific, and transports with landing troops. The secretary of foreign relations added that, at 1 o'clock a. m. today, the United States ambassador had convened in the quarters of the embassy some members of the diplomatic corps to whom he made known the impending arrival of the ships, and his firm and positive opinion that 3,000 marines would come to the City of Mexico in order to protect the lives and interests of Americans as well as of other foreigners residing therein.

RICARDO R. GUZMAN, Senator and Secretary.
JOSE CASTELLOT, Senator and Secretary.

MEXICO, February 15, 1913.

When Huerta arrested the President of Mexico, Madero, he immediately gave out a notice to the Mexican people that he had assumed the executive power, and that he was holding under arrest "Mr. Francisco I. Madero and his Cabinet," as follows:

NOTICE.

In view of the most difficult circumstances through which the nation is passing, and particularly in recent days, the capital of the Republic, which, through the work of the defective government of Mr. Madero, may well be characterized as being in an almost anarchical situation, I have assumed the executive power and, pending the immediate convening of the Chambers of the Union, in order to pass upon this present political situation, I am holding under arrest in the National Palace Mr. Francisco I. Madero and his Cabinet, in order that as soon as this point is decided and in an effort to reconcile people's minds during the present historical moments we may all work in behalf of peace, which is a matter of life or death to the entire nation.

Given in the palace of the Executive, on February 18, 1913.

V. HUERTA,
Military Commanding General
in charge of the Executive Power.

At 9.30, February 18, Huerta and Felix Diaz met at the American Embassy, where the American ambassador cooperated in having them reach an understanding to work together, upon the basis that Huerta should be the provisional President of the Republic, and that Diaz should name the Cabinet, and that thereafter Diaz should have the support of Huerta in being elected as the permanent President. Their agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

In the City of Mexico, at 9.30 p. m., of February 18, 1913, Gens. Felix Diaz and Victoriano Huerta met together, the former being assisted by Attorneys Fidencio Hernandez and Rodolfo Reyes and the latter by Lieut. Col. Joaquin Maas and Engineer Enrique Zepeda; and Gen. Huerta stated that, inasmuch as the situation of Mr. Madero's government was unsustainable, and in order to avoid further bloodshed and out of feelings of national fraternity, he had made prisoners of said gentleman, his cabinet, and other persons, and that he wished to express his good wishes to Gen. Diaz to the effect that the elements represented by him might fraternize and, all united, save the present distressful situation. Gen. Diaz stated that his movements had had no other object than to serve the national welfare, and that accordingly he was ready to make any sacrifice which might redound to the benefit of the country.

After discussions had taken place on the subject among all those present, as mentioned above, the following was agreed upon:

First. From this time on the executive power which held sway is deemed not to exist and is not recognized, the elements represented by Gens. Diaz and Huerta pledging themselves to prevent by all means any attempt to restore said power.

Second. Endeavor will be made as soon as possible to adjust the existing situation under the best possible legal conditions, and Gens. Diaz and Huerta will make every effort to the end that the latter may within 72 hours assume the provisional presidency of the Republic, with the following cabinet:

Foreign relations: Lic. Francisco L. de la Barra.
Treasury: Toribio Esquival Obregon.
War: Gen. Manuel Mondragon.
Fomento: Eng. Alberto Garcia Granados.
Justice: Lic. Rodolfo Reyes.
Public instruction: Lic. J. Vera Estañol.
Communications: Eng. David de la Fuente.

There shall be created a new ministry, to be charged specially with solving the agrarian problem and matters connected therewith, being called the ministry of agriculture, and the portfolio thereof being intrusted to Lic. Manuel Garza Adalpe. Any modifications which may for any reason be decided upon in this cabinet slate shall take place in the same manner in which the slate itself was made up.

Third. While the legal situation is being determined and settled Gens. Huerta and Diaz are placed in charge of all elements and authorities of every kind, the exercise whereof may be necessary in order to afford guaranties.

Fourth. Gen. Felix Diaz declines the offer to form part of the provisional cabinet in case Gen. Huerta assumes the provisional presidency, in order that he may remain at liberty to undertake his work along the lines of his compromises with his party at the coming election, which purpose he wishes to express clearly and which is fully understood by the signers.

Fifth. Official notice shall immediately be given to the foreign representatives, it being confined to stating to them that the executive power has ceased; that provision is being made for a legal substitute therefor; that meantime the full authority thereof is vested in Gens. Diaz and Huerta; and that all proper guaranties will be afforded to their respective countrymen.

Sixth. All revolutionists shall at once be invited to cease their hostile movements, endeavor being made to reach the necessary settlements.

Gen. VICTORIANO HUERTA.
Gen. FELIX DIAZ.

As soon as this agreement was reached, Huerta and Diaz issued the following joint proclamation:

[From Mexican Herald.]

JOINT PROCLAMATION.

To the Mexican people:

The unendurable and distressing situation through which the capital of the Republic has passed obliged the army, represented by the undersigned, to unite in a sentiment of fraternity to achieve the salvation of the country. In consequence the nation may be at rest; all liberties compatible with order are assured under the responsibility of the undersigned chiefs, who at once assumed command and administration in so far as is necessary to afford full guarantees to nationals and foreigners, promising that within 72 hours the legal situation will have been duly organized. The army invites the people, on whom it relies, to continue in the noble attitude of respect and moderation which it has hitherto observed; it also invites all revolutionary factions to unite for the consolidation of national peace.

Mexico, February 18, 1913.

V. HUERTA.
FELIX DIAZ.

The legislature of the sovereign State of Coahuila, on February 19, the very next day, denounced Huerta's usurpation and directed Gov. Carranza to use the armed forces of the State in supporting Madero as the constitutional President.

On March 24 the Legislature of Sonora denounced the usurpation of Huerta, and thereafter in succession 10 of the elected governors of the States of Mexico joined the revolution. It is interesting to observe what became of the various governors of the various States of Mexico under Huerta's usurpation. The following 10 governors were replaced by military governors and all joined the revolution:

Gov. Felipe Riveros, of Sinaloa; Gov. Venus Tiano Carranza, of Coahuila; Gov. Jose M. Maytorena, of Sonora; Gov. Alberto Fuentes, of the State of Aguascalientes; Gov. Miguel Silva, of Michoacan; Gov. Ramon Rosales, of the State of Hidalgo; Gov. Inocecio Lugo, of the State of Guerrero; Gov. J. Castillo Brito, of the State of Campeche; Gov. A. Camara Vales, of the State of Yucatan; Gov. Matias Guera, of the State of Tamaulipas. Abraham Gonzalez, governor of Chihuahua, was murdered by Rabago, a major general under Huerta, by tying the governor on the railroad track and slowly backing a yard engine over him to give him a proper realization of the horror of death. Gov. De la Barra went abroad to Paris, France; and Gov. Rafael Zapeda, of the State of San Luis Potosi, and Gov. Trinidad Alamillo, of the State of Colima, and Gov. Patricio Leyva, of the State of Morelos, were thrown in prison. Gov. Bibiano Villareal, of Nueva Leon, fled the country and went to New York. Gov. Carlos Potani, of the State of Durango, fled the country and went to San Antonio, Tex. Six of the other governors went to Mexico City, and the governor of Puebla and Tlaxcala and Queretaro were the only ones who remained at home out of 28 governors elected by the people.

On February 19, 1913, under the duress of the fear of death and on the promise of the safeguard of their lives, the President and Vice President of Mexico signed the following resignation:

In view of the events which have occurred since yesterday in the nation and for its greater tranquillity, we formally resign our positions of President and Vice President, respectively, to which we were elected. We protest whatever may be necessary.

FRANCISCO I. MADERO.
JOSE M. PINO SUAREZ.

MEXICO CITY, February 19, 1913.

I am informed that this resignation was obtained from President Madero and Vice President Suarez under the fear of instant death, but was signed by them upon the agreed condition that it should be held by the minister from Chile, a friend of Madero, in escro, until President Madero and Vice President Suarez could find safe asylum on a foreign warship. The agreement was broken, the resignation used as a basis of having Lascurain, minister of foreign relations under Madero, proclaimed provisional President. He took the oath of office and did not appoint a secretary of foreign relations, but he did appoint Victoriano Huerta secretary of gobernacion. Huerta took the oath as secretary of gobernacion, and Lascurain immediately resigned as provisional President, thus devolving the presidency upon Huerta as next in line, and he took the oath of office before Congress as President of the Republic. These simultaneous acts, of course—the resignations of the President and Vice President, procured by military force and duress, the resignation of Lascurain under the same force—can not be regarded as a legitimate conduct of public affairs, the entire procedure being void, as treason against the people of Mexico, punishable with death under the constitution and laws of Mexico.

On Saturday, February 22—Washington's Birthday—Huerta, as President, had the deposed President Madero and Vice President Suarez transferred from the national palace, not to a warship, where they might escape with their lives, but to the penitentiary in Mexico City. At 10 o'clock Huerta is alleged to have changed the commandante of the penitentiary, and at 11 o'clock Madero and Suarez were killed.

On February 24, 1913, the new minister of foreign relations, De la Barra, made a report to the members of the diplomatic corps, giving an account of the death of President Madero and Vice President Suarez, and promising the fullest judicial investigation, and that minutes of all proceedings should be furnished the diplomatic representatives of the foreign powers, it being commonly believed that Huerta had had these men assassinated, as was afterwards openly charged against Huerta on September 23, 1913, in the Mexican Senate by Senator Dominguez, of Chiapas.

The minutes of the judicial investigation have never been furnished, and the United States has no adequate official information except the statement of Huerta made to De la Barra and Señor Garcia, 11.30 Saturday night, that as Madero and Suarez were being conveyed in an automobile to the penitentiary they were killed in an exchange of shots between the escort in whose custody they were held and a group of individuals unknown who had attempted to rescue them.

Huerta had assured Madero and Suarez their safety before using their resignations. He was responsible for their safeguard. Huerta was also fully advised, because Madero's mother and Suarez's wife had gone to Ambassador Wilson and prayed him to intercede with Huerta to spare the life of Madero and Suarez and to allow them to go to Europe, stating "that this was the expressed condition attached to their resignation," and Ambassador Wilson made the appeal to Huerta.

I am informed that De la Barra advised Huerta that unless he were satisfied the murder of Madero was not at the connivance of the Government he would immediately resign with two of his colleagues.

It is interesting to see what became of this cabinet, arranged in the pact between Huerta and Diaz and whose members had been named by Diaz.

Of this cabinet named by Felix Diaz under the pact, the secretary of foreign affairs, De la Barra, is in France; the secretary of finance, Obregon, is a general in the Constitutional Army making war on Huerta, and recently refused to consider cooperating with the Federal troops against the United States; Rudolph Reyes, of the department of justice, has been killed; the secretary of public instruction, Estannol, has fled to the United States; the secretary of communications, De la Fuente, has gone abroad; the minister of agriculture, Alvarpe, has resigned; and the secretary of fomento, Alberto Gill; the secretary of interior, Alberto Glenodes, are out of the cabinet and gone.

Felix Diaz, who made the pact with Huerta, fled from Mexico for fear of assassination by Huerta's orders.

The American ambassador, Wilson, made a strenuous effort to have Huerta recognized. As dean of the diplomatic corps, he made a speech of congratulation to Huerta upon his accession to the presidency. He urged our State Department to recognize Huerta. He instructed all American consuls to do everything possible to bring about a general acceptance of Huerta, and advised them that Huerta would be immediately recognized by all foreign Governments. On February 24 Ambassador Wilson advised the Government that the Madero incident had produced no effect upon the public mind and that Consul Holland had telegraphed that Huerta's government refused to accept the adhesion of Gov. Carranza, of Coahuila; was sending troops against him, and that Carranza had evacuated his capital. When the secretary of the British legation expressed the opinion that his Government would not recognize Huerta on account of the murder of Madero, Ambassador Wilson expressed the opinion that it would be a great error, endangering Huerta's government, upon the safety of which all foreigners depended. Our ambassador expressed the opinion that Huerta's government was not privy to the murder of Madero and Suarez, and that either the occurrence was as stated or that the death of Madero and Suarez was due to a subordinate military conspiracy, and he was of the opinion also that the murder of Madero and Suarez, as two Mexicans relegated to private life by their resignations, should arouse no greater expressions of popular disapproval in the United States than the murder, unrequited by justice, of some 75 or 80 Americans in Mexico during the preceding two years.

Our ambassador ceased to be an acceptable medium of communication between President Wilson and the authorities of Mexico, and for this reason his resignation was accepted.

Huerta's usurpation of the governing powers of the people of Mexico, his military revolution, overthrowing the President and Vice President of Mexico and bringing about the immediate death of these officers elected by the Mexican people, was not approved by a large part of the people of Mexico, who, however, were, for the most part, intimidated by the military power of Huerta and by the bloodthirsty disposition shown by him and by his military clique. Huerta is the product of his environment. He had, since his boyhood, been the witness of the killing by military order of citizens who proved obnoxious to the government of Porfirio Diaz. I have no doubt that Huerta regards such conduct as entirely justifiable. There are those in the United States in sympathy with Huerta and his military commercial despotism controlling Mexico, who say that no other kind of government is possible in Mexico except a military despotism.

Against this cruel, unwise, unjust conception I enter my solemn protest, and I declare it to be my profound belief that the people of Mexico are, in the main, an industrious, worthy, honest, good-hearted people, who would like to be at peace with the world, and who would rejoice in a stable government under constitutional guaranties, and that they have abundant intelligence to carry it out if they can be freed from the despotism now in control of their government.

No man, who has observed the sacrifices which are being made by the people of Mexico in trying to restore constitutional government, should deny their attachment to liberty and the constitutional law.

No man, who looks at the record of the elected governors of the States of Mexico, who might have bought their peace by subserviency of Huerta, who witnessed the brave and upright conduct of the Mexican congressmen imprisoned by Huerta, the brave conduct of Senator Dominguez in speaking the truth at the cost of life and the enormous sacrifices now being made by the Mexicans on the field of battle, should doubt the attitude of the people of Mexico. The people of Mexico have in them the Divine spark, they have been taught the Christian virtues and they have the same natural affections and passions as other people of like blood. They have had no fair chance.

Mr. President, the governors of Mexico were not the only ones to express their hostility to the active usurpation by Huerta. Various members of Congress in Mexico expressed their disapproval of Huerta's conduct, and representing, as they did, the people of Mexico, and even more particularly those who were the beneficiaries of the monopolistic system of Mexico, nevertheless showed were not willing to have the constitutional guaranties overthrown. The cruelty and unlawful violence of the government of Huerta was shown by the methods pursued against them. A few instances of which I think should be enumerated.

For instance, a member of Congress, Serapia Arendon, having expressed his lack of sympathy with the Huerta régime, was warned in several ways that his life was in great jeopardy, and on the night of the 22d of August, 1913, he was suddenly seized, rushed in an automobile to the Thanepantla Barracks, where some shots were heard, and he has never been seen since.

The condition being intolerable, a member of the Senate of Mexico, Senator Belisario Dominguez, representing the State of Chiapas, finally made up his mind to do his duty by denouncing this usurpation and treason, knowing that it would cost him his life. It is reported that he made his will, bade his family farewell, and on the 23d of September delivered in writing a speech in the Senate of Mexico. The president of the Senate refused to allow his speech to be delivered, but could not prevent its being made a part of the record.

I shall read that speech:

Sept. 23, 1913. Address of Belisario Dominguez, Senator from the Sovereign State of Chiapas to the Senate of the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. President of the Senate: The matter being of urgent interest for the welfare of the country, I am compelled to set aside the usual formulas and to ask you please to begin this session by taking cognizance of this sheet and making it known at once to the honorable members of the Senate.

Gentlemen: You all have read with deep interest the message presented by Don Victoriano Huerta to the Congress of the Union on the 16th instant.

There is no doubt, gentlemen, that you as well as myself felt indignant in the face of the accumulation of falsities contained in that document. Whom does that message aim to deceive, gentlemen? The Congress of the Union? No, gentlemen; all its members are cultured persons who take an interest in politics, who are in touch with events in this country, and who can not be deceived on the subject. Is it the Mexican Nation that is to be deceived? Is it this noble country which, trusting in your honesty, has placed in your hands her most sacred interests? What must the National Assembly do in this case? It must respond promptly to the trust and confidence of the nation which has honored this body with her representation, and it must let her know the truth and so prevent her falling into the abyss which is opening at her feet.

The truth is this: During the reign of Don Victoriano Huerta not only has nothing been done in favor of the pacification of the country, but the present condition of the Mexican Republic is infinitely worse than ever before. The revolution is spreading everywhere. Many nations, formerly good friends of Mexico, now refuse to recognize this Government, since it is an illegal one. Our coin is depreciated, our credit in the throes of agony. The whole press of the Republic, either muzzled or shamelessly sold to the Government, systematically conceals the truth. Our fields are abandoned. Many towns have been destroyed, and, lastly, famine and misery in all its forms threaten to spread throughout our unhappy country. What is the cause of such a wretched situation?

First, and above anything else, this condition is due to the fact that the Mexican people can not submit and yield to and accept as President of the Republic the soldier who snatched the power by means of a treason and whose first act on rising to the Presidency was to assassinate in the most cowardly manner the President and Vice President legally consecrated by the popular vote, and the first of these two men, he who promoted and gave position to Don Victoriano Huerta and covered him with honors, was the man to whom Victoriano Huerta publicly swore loyalty and faithfulness.

In the second place, this situation is the result of the means adopted by Don Victoriano Huerta and which he has been employing in order to obtain the pacification of the country. You know what these means are; nothing but extermination, death for all the men, all the families, all the towns which do not sympathize with his Government.

Peace will be made at any cost whatever, said Don Victoriano Huerta. Have you studied, gentlemen, the terrible meaning of these words of the egotistical, ferocious man, Don Victoriano Huerta? They mean that he is ready to shed all the Mexican blood, to cover with corpses the whole surface of the national territory, to convert our country into one immense ruin, so that he may not leave the presidential chair, nor shed a single drop of his own blood.

In his insane anxiety to keep the post of President—

I ask the Senate to listen to this—

In his insane anxiety to keep the post of President, Victoriano Huerta is committing a new infamy. He is provoking an international conflict with the United States of America.

Where was that said? On the floor of the Mexican senate, by a Mexican senator who had made his will, had made his peace with God, had bid farewell to his family, knowing that he would go to his immediate death.

The Senate of the United States wants to observe these words and hear where they come from—from the senator from Chiapas, Belisario Dominguez, who was immediately killed, who knew that he would be killed, and who was willing to die to have the right to speak the truth in the cause of humanity, and of justice, and of Mexico.

In his insane anxiety to keep the post of President Victoriano Huerta is committing a new infamy. He is provoking an international conflict with the United States of America, a conflict, in which, if it is to be solved by fighting, all surviving Mexicans would participate, giving stoically the last drop of their blood, giving their lives—all save Don Victoriano Huerta and Don Aureliano Blanquet; because these disgraced ones are stained with the blot of treason, and the nation and the army will repudiate them when the time comes.

It seems as if our ruin were unavoidable, for Don Victoriano Huerta has taken hold of power in such a way, in order to insure the triumph of his candidacy to the Presidency of the Republic in the elections to be held October 26, that he has not hesitated to violate the sovereignty of the greater part of the States, deposing the legally elected constitutional governors and supplanting them with military governors who will take good care to cheat the people by means of ridiculous and criminal farces.

And so they did cheat the people by elections that were criminal under the order of Huerta, an order which I shall presently read into the RECORD.

However, gentlemen, a supreme effort might save everything. Let the national assembly fulfill its duty and the nation is saved, and she will rise up and become greater, stronger, more beautiful than ever.

The national assembly has the duty of deposing Don Victoriano Huerta from the Presidency. He is the one against whom our brothers, up in arms in the North, protest, and, consequently, he is the one least able to carry out the pacification which is the supreme desire of all Mexicans.

You will tell me, gentlemen, that the attempt is dangerous; for Don Victoriano Huerta is a bloodthirsty and ferocious soldier who assassinates anyone who is an obstacle to his wishes; but this should not matter, gentlemen. The country exacts from you the fulfillment of a duty, though there is the risk, the certainty, that you will lose your lives.

Is this man without patriotism? Is this man without love of country? Is this man without love of justice and righteousness in government, when he makes his appeal to the Mexican Senate? Shall we despise a people capable of such a sacrifice as this great senator who died in the performance of duty deliberately?

He said:

If, in your anxiety to see peace reigning again in the Republic, you committed a mistake and put faith in the false words of the man who promised to pacify the Republic, to-day, when you see clearly that this man is an imposter, a wicked inept who is fast pushing the nation toward ruin, will you, for fear of death, permit such a man to continue to wield power? Reflect, gentlemen, meditate, and reply to this query.

What would be said of those on a vessel who, during a violent storm on a treacherous sea, would appoint as pilot a butcher who had no nautical knowledge, who was on his first sea trip, and who had no other recommendation to the post than the fact of his having betrayed and assassinated the captain of the vessel?

Your duty is unalterable, ineludible, gentlemen, and the nation expects of you its fulfillment.

This first duty discharged, it will be easy for the National Assembly to fulfill others derived from it, asking all revolutionary chiefs to stop all active hostilities and to appoint their delegates in order that by general accord the President be elected who is to call for presidential elections, and who is to use care that these be carried out in all legality.

The world is looking on us, gentlemen, members of the National Assembly, and the nation hopes that you will honor her before the world, saving her from the shame of having as first magistrate a traitor and an assassin.

(Signed) DR. B. DOMINGUEZ.
Senator for Chiapas.

Immediately afterwards, Senator Belisario Dominguez suddenly and mysteriously disappeared and was reported to have been killed.

On October 9th, the Chamber of Deputies of the Congress of Mexico passed the following resolution:

(1) That a commission formed of three deputies be appointed for the purpose of making all necessary investigations to find out where Senator Belisario Dominguez is and that it be empowered with all the facilities which it deems necessary for the matter in hand. (2) That the senate be invited to appoint a commission for the same object. (3) The commission of the Camara will propose what may be necessary in view of the result of the investigation. (4) That this motion be communicated to the executive so that he may impart whatever aid may be necessary to the commission or commissions, as the case may be, making known to him that the national representation places the lives of the deputies and senators under the protection of said executive who has at his disposition the necessary elements to enforce the immunity which the constitution authorizes to those functionaries. (5) That said executive be informed that in case the disappearance of another deputy or senator occurs and the national representation will be obliged to celebrate its session where it may find guarantees.

Immediately afterwards, on October 10, in the afternoon, Huerta's minister of gobernacion appeared in the chamber and demanded a reconsideration of these resolutions. The president of the Chamber of Deputies arose and adjourned the chamber, whereupon 110 deputies present were arrested by Huerta's soldiers and sent to the penitentiary. Huerta had all the exits barred and appeared in person before the Congress to enforce his demand, and his demand, in spite of his bloody character and cruel power, was not acceded to by the Mexican Congress. Huerta immediately published a decree declaring the Congress dissolved and without further power and immediately declared the judicial and legislative power vested in himself and that the constitutional guaranties against arrest of members of Congress were suspended.

These decrees were signed by him as of October 11, but were put into effect October 10, as follows:

Victoriano Huerta, constitutional President ad interim of the Mexican United States, to its inhabitants makes known that the Chamber of Deputies and Senators of the Twenty-sixth Legislature having been dissolved and inhabilitated from exercising their functions and until the people elect new magistrates who shall take over the legislative powers, and in the belief that the Government should count on all the necessary faculties to face the situation and to reestablish the constitutional order of things in the shortest possible time as is its purpose since October 26 has been set as a date for elections for deputies and senators, has seen fit to decree that articles of decree.

ARTICLE ONE. The judicial power of the federation shall continue in its functions within the limits set by the constitution of the Republic and the decree of the executive of October 10 of this month and such others as shall be issued by him.

ARTICLE TWO. The executive power of the union conserves the powers conferred upon him by the constitution and assumes furthermore the departments of gobernacion, hacienda, and war only for the time absolutely necessary for the reestablishment of the legislative power. In the meantime the executive takes upon himself the powers granted the legislative power by the constitution in the aforementioned departments and will make use of them by issuing decrees which shall be observed generally and which he may deem expedient for the public welfare.

ARTICLE THREE. The executive of the union will render an account to the legislative power of the use which he makes of the powers which he assumes by means of this decree as soon as this is in function. Wherefore, I order that this be printed, published, and given due fulfillment. Given at the National Palace of Mexico, October 11, 1913.

(Signed) V. HUERTA.

Victoriano Huerta, constitutional president ad interim of the Mexican United States, to its inhabitants makes known that in view of the fact that the Chamber of Deputies and Senators of the Congress of the union have been dissolved and inhabilitated to perform their functions, and in view of the powers which I hold in the Department of Gobernacion according to the decree of October 11 of this year, I have seen fit to decree that article 1, the constitutional exemption from arrest and judicial action which the citizens which formed the Twenty-sixth Congress of the union enjoyed in view of their functions, is hereby repealed and consequently they are subject to the jurisdiction of the tribunals corresponding to the case in the event that they are guilty of any crime or offense. Wherefore I order that this be printed, published, and duly fulfilled. Given at the National Palace in Mexico October 11, 1913.

(Signed) V. HUERTA.

On October 11 the entire diplomatic corps was received by the minister of foreign affairs, who advised them that while the act of Huerta's Government was unconstitutional, still that the Government had become impossible with the Chamber as at present constituted. The Spanish minister, at an hour after midnight, October 10, called on Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the American chargé d'affaires, and they went together and demanded guaranties of the minister of foreign affairs for the lives of the arrested Congressmen. What a spectacle before the civilized world is this midnight visit to prevent wholesale assassination! The promise was given, but only a list of 84 was presented as those in prison. What became of the 24 others arrested I do not know, but I should like to know.

On October 13 Huerta charged the members of Congress with sedition and treason, and stated that they should be tried. Huerta's secretary informed O'Shaughnessy that most of the deputies arrested had been set at liberty, but in point of fact they acknowledged having 84 of the 110 arrested in the penitentiary at midnight, October 10, and on November 13, 1913, the members of Congress whose names I have already given were recorded still in the penitentiary, and many of them were still in the penitentiary when we took Vera Cruz.

The President of the United States had refused to recognize Huerta for the reasons well known, and had been urging a new election so that the people of Mexico, even under the defective election law, might choose a successor to Huerta.

On October 10, 1913, when Huerta had put the Mexican Congress in the penitentiary, he issued a decree for the election, on October 26, of a new Congress and of a President.

On October 14, 1913, he issued the following decree, modifying the election laws to make the corrupt control of the election absolutely certain, putting the power in the hands of his instruments. I ask permission to put the decree into the RECORD without reading.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish the Senator from Oklahoma would read the order which he says Huerta issued setting aside the election laws.

Mr. OWEN. The first order issued was this:

Victoriano Huerta, constitutional President ad interim of the Mexican United States, to its inhabitants makes known that the Chamber of Deputies and Senators of the 26th legislature having been dissolved and inhabilitated from exercising their functions, and until the people elect new magistrates who shall take over the legislative powers, and in the belief that the Government should count on all the necessary faculties to face the situation and to reestablish the constitutional order of things in the shortest possible time, as is its purpose, since October 26 has been set as a date for elections for deputies and senators, has seen fit to decree that articles of decree.

ARTICLE ONE. The judicial power of the federation shall continue in its functions within the limits set by the constitution of the Republic and the decree of the Executive of October 10 of this month and such others as shall be issued by him.

ARTICLE TWO. The executive power of the Union conserves the powers conferred upon him by the constitution and assumes, furthermore, the departments of gobernacion, hacienda, and war only for the time absolutely necessary for the reestablishment of the legislative power. In the meantime the Executive takes upon himself the powers granted the legislative power by the constitution in the aforementioned departments and will make use of them by issuing decrees, which shall be observed generally and which he may deem expedient for the public welfare.

ARTICLE THREE. The Executive of the Union will render an account to the legislative power of the use which he makes of the powers which he assumes by means of this decree as soon as this is in function. Wherefore I order that this be printed, published, and given due fulfillment.

At the same time he issued a decree declaring that the right of safety and immunity from arrest of members of Congress was set aside and abrogated and, as I have stated, put the whole Congress in the penitentiary. He says:

I have seen fit to decree that article 1, the constitutional exemption from arrest and judicial action which the citizens which formed the twenty-sixth congress of the union enjoyed in view of their functions, is hereby repealed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And yet some people want such a man recognized as the President of Mexico?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes; some people want him recognized. I do not know why. I suppose they do not know about him, but I thought it well enough to let the people of this country know something about Huerta. For that reason I have thought proper to present these various documents, showing his conduct as the alleged head of the Mexican Government. Here is the decree which he issued as to the election laws, putting the power in the hands of his military governors and jefe politicos that they might be able to make false returns of the elections:

Victoriano Huerta, Constitutional President ad interim of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants thereof: Know ye, that to the end that the extraordinary elections of senators and deputies to the Congress of the Union, convoked by decree under date of the 10th instant, be carried out with all regularity, I have seen fit to decree the following:

ARTICLE 1. In accordance with article 5 of the decree of the 10th instant, the extraordinary elections of deputies and senators will be subject to the conditions of the electoral law of December 19, 1911, with the additions and modifications which follow.

ART. 2. The elections shall be by direct vote; they shall be held at the same time as those for president and vice president of the Republic; the same electoral divisions shall serve for them as were formed under the law to that effect of the 31st of May last, and the same designation of polling officials and scrutinizers which was made under the provisions of the same law shall subsist. Candidates must register.

ART. 3. The registration of the candidates provided for in article 68 of the electoral law of December 19, 1911, shall be carried out before the 20th of this month, and the handing over of credentials which is ordered in the same article, as well as the designation of representatives of parties or candidates, shall be complied with at the same time these latter are inscribed.

ART. 4. The voting shall be subject to the terms of the electoral law of December 19, 1911, and in accord with the following rules: New polling regulations. "1. The polling official shall hand to each voter, in addition to the lists which correspond to the election of President and Vice President of the Republic, the various lists for the casting of votes for deputies and senators and shall proceed to collect the votes in urns or boxes which shall be separate and distinctly marked, one for the election of President and Vice President, another for the election of deputies, and a third for the election of senators.

Second. When the polls are closed definitely, the total count of the votes cast for President and Vice President shall be made in accordance with the law of the 31st of last May, and afterwards the count shall be made of the votes for deputies and senators, respectively, the result of the latter being made known in separate documents, which shall be remitted, together with the designation of the electoral district and the voting slips to the highest authority residing in the place designated as capital (cabecera) of the electoral district (that is, to his military governors), and if there be no cabecera they shall be turned over to the highest municipal authority. Juntas to count ballots.

Third. The count of the votes cast in each electoral district shall be made by a junta formed by the highest political authority to which the foregoing fraction refers, or in default of him by the first municipal authority and by two councilmen (concajales) named by the ayuntamiento of the cabecera of the electoral district. The default of any of the members of this junta shall be made good by the regideres of the ayuntamiento, according to the order of their enumeration, and in default of these, by those who will have held such position the preceding year, according to their enumeration. The designation of the two councilmen who are to form part of the junta shall be made by the ayuntamientos in public session and by secret ballot on Thursday the 23d of the present month. Jefe Politico to preside.

Fourth. The junta shall assemble in junta shall be made by the ayuntamiente on Sunday, the 26th of the present month, at 6 o'clock in the evening, being presided over by the jefe politico, and in his absence by the highest municipal authority. It shall designate secretary from among its members and shall commission another of its members to examine the returns as they be received, and the junta shall reassemble on the 2d day of November next to make the count, after the rendering of the report which the commission shall present.

Fifth. The junta shall abstain from making any remarks respecting the defects which affect the votes cast or those which may be alleged by the parties or candidates registered, and shall limit itself to making them known in its minutes, so that they may be passed upon definitely by the Chamber of Deputies or by the corresponding legislature, according to whether it is a matter of election of deputies or senators. Credentials in quadruplicate.

Sixth. After the count has been made of votes cast, the deputies proprietory and substitute shall be declared elected and the number of votes cast for each one of the candidates for senator proprietory and substitute shall be declared and the corresponding reports shall be made. The report in regard to deputies shall be made in four copies; one shall be sent to the Chamber of Deputies, together with all the election documents and vote certificates; another copy shall be sent to the Ministry of Gobernacion; and the other two shall be remitted to the citizens elected deputy proprietory and substitute, respectively, so that they may serve as credentials. The report of the election of senators shall be made in three copies, one of which shall be sent to the Senate, one to the Ministry of Gobernacion, and the third to the Legislature of the State, that that body may make its declaration relative to the election of senators proprietory and substitute. To report before November 10.

Seventh. The junta shall make its report as soon as it shall have received those of all the municipalities of the electoral district or a report to the effect that the elections were not held, but in any case it must present its report by the 10th of next November. The result of the count made by the junta shall be published immediately after its session shall have adjourned on the doors of the municipal palace and as soon as possible thereafter in the official organ of the corresponding federative entity.

ART. 5. The juntas for examining the votes shall make their counts strictly in accordance with the reports from the various booths and abstain from making any comment on the votes emitted, under pain of a $200 fine for each member of the junta who violates this rule. The respective chamber or legislature, as the case may be, will hand over to the respective judges of the district any violators of this law, so that the fine aforesaid may be duly enforced. Therefore, I order that be printed, published, and duly carried out.

Given in the National Palace of Mexico, October 12, 1913.

On October 22 there were sent out private instructions to the governors of various States instructing them in effect to make false returns in Huerta's interest, and to make sure that the election of President would be void by returning an insufficient number of precincts, as follows:

PRIVATE INSTRUCTIONS FROM THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO GEN. JOAQUIN MAAS, MILITARY GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF PUEBLA, TO THE END THAT HE MAY TRANSMIT THE SAME TO THE JEFES POLITICOS OF THE STATE.

First. If any municipal president has entered into agreements with any of the militant political parties his removal from office shall be discreetly sought, and in the case it should not be possible, cautious efforts shall be made to secure complete solidarity between said presidents and the jefes politicos.

Second. It is especially recommended that the persons in charge of the polls should be completely and absolutely reliable, so that they may follow the instructions given to them.

Third. If there should be sufficient time for it, strict orders should be given that polls for rural estates should not be established in the seat of the municipality or town, but in the estates themselves of the electoral division, this for the purpose of avoiding the attendance of those who are to take charge of the polls, the principal object being to prevent the elections in two-thirds, plus one, of the polls constituting the district. Therefore the greatest number of polls shall be ———. To meet the provisions of the law and conceal the above-mentioned commission, a complete list should be published, giving the names of the persons who are to have charge of the polls in accordance with article 13 of the electoral law of May 31, 1913, it being understood that only the appointments corresponding to the third part or less shall be sent to the sections, among which are to be included the polls in the urban wards.

Fourth. In all the polls which may operate blank tickets shall be made use of in order that the absolute majority of the votes may be cast in favor of Gen. Huerta for President and Gen. Blanquet for Vice President.

Fifth. In spite of the fact that article 31 provides that the returns should be at once and directly sent to the chamber of deputies, the chairman of the polls shall be instructed that the returns be sent to the political prefecture, which returns shall be quickly examined by the jefe politico, and if the same are found to be in accordance with the instructions given therein, he shall return them to the chairman, informing them that they must send them directly to the chamber of deputies. If upon making the examination it should appear that the third part of the polls have not acted right, they shall fail to send the number of returns that may be necessary to the end that the chamber of deputies may receive only one-third or less of the total.

Sixth. Political parties and citizens shall be given full freedom in the polls which may operate, allowing them to make all kinds of protests, provided they refer to votes in favor of any of the candidates appearing before the people; but care shall be taken that such protests do not refer to the votes mentioned in paragraph 4 of these instructions.

Seventh. If upon examining the returns the jefes politicos should find that the votes do not agree with the instructions, before sending them they should fix them up to the end that the note of transmission, the minutes of the election, etc., should agree with the instructions.

Eighth. Persons shall be chosen who may inspire absolute confidence and may be well versed in the electoral law to make a quiet and reserved inspection of the polls which may be in operation and to present before them all sorts of protests, in accordance with article 30 of the electoral law, it being understood that all protests should refer to the candidates who may be in the field, but never in regard to votes mentioned in paragraph 4.

Ninth. After elections they shall make a quick concentration of the polls which were in operation and shall communicate this information to the Government if possible on the same day and in cipher and by special courier.

Tenth. Under their most strict responsibility the governor of a State who may receive these instructions shall comply with them under the penalty of discharge of office and other punishment which the Federal Government may see fit to apply.

MEXICO, October 22, 1913.

By October 15 it had become obvious, and the representatives of nearly all of the powers except Great Britain had reached the point where they considered armed intervention by the United States as practically inevitable. It was already obvious that Huerta would not permit Diaz to stand as a candidate for the Presidency, notwithstanding his agreement with him of February 18, 1913.

Diaz had named the cabinet, it is true, but the cabinet was set aside one by one, and Diaz was instructed to go to Japan and then to Europe, and finally dared not to return to Mexico, but receiving a command from Huerta to return to Mexico to resume his post in the army, Diaz came to Vera Cruz, was put under instant surveillance by Huerta's forces, but, by a skillful maneuver, fled by night to a warship and saved his life; he profoundly believed that he was on the point of being assassinated and did flee by night just before the election, and is now in the United States.

On October 23 Huerta advised the diplomatic corps of Mexico City that he had dissolved the Congress of Mexico, because it was disloyal and revolutionary, 50 deputies having joined the revolutionists. He stated that he was not a candidate for the presidential office; that votes for him would be null and void, even if a majority of votes were cast for him; that he would not accept the Presidency, not only because the constitution prohibited him, but because he had given public promise to the contrary, and he requested the diplomats to give these solemn assurances to their respective countries.

Immediately before the election of October 26 the country was flooded with circulars urging the people to vote for Huerta for President. The circulars were as big as the door of the Senate Chamber, urging people to vote for this man who said he was not running for the Presidency. Immediately after the election, on October 27, Huerta's minister of gobernacion publicly announced that the election returns from Puebla, San Luis Potosi, showed a "landslide" for Huerta and Blanquet.

Mr. THOMAS. It was a case of the office seeking the man?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, the office sought the man; he could not escape it. Huerta then issued an intimidating decree to raise the army to 150,000 men, a decree which he could not carry out.

On November 20, 1913, the newly elected Mexican Congress convened. Huerta addressed them and they replied with assurances of patriotism, etc., and on December 10 the grand committee of Congress solemnly reported to Huerta that of 14,425 voting precincts only 7,157 reported, and hence that there had been no election of a President, under article 42, clause 3, of the constitution of Mexico. This result (a result which Huerta had carefully planned, as I have explained, by modifying the election laws, and then giving secret instructions to his military governors) they elaborately explained to Huerta could be accounted for, first, because a part of the territory was in revolution, and, second, because a part of the territory was near the revolutionary country, and, third, that where the territory was under Huerta's control the people had not voted for "reasons of a general nature."

They recommended that Huerta continue as President until a lawful election at some future time when Congress should issue the necessary declaration.

I submit Exhibit 4, a memorial of a committee of the people of Puebla and Tlaxcala and addressed to John Lind, showing a very interesting Mexican point of view. I omit names for obvious reasons.

Mr. President, I have thought proper to put into the RECORD the documents showing the conduct of this man, because I do not think the people of the United States sufficiently understand the facts relating to our occupation of Vera Cruz. We are there primarily because of what might be called the straw that broke the camel's back, the open and flagrant insult before the nations of the world of our flag and of our uniform by the arrest of our unarmed men and parading them through the streets of Tampico in derision, and then refusing to make the amends required by international law. I believe that Senator Dominguez stated the truth when at the cost of his life he charged Huerta with the purpose of bringing about a conflict with the United States. And what was the purpose of bringing about a conflict with the United States? It was to save his precious neck, because Zapata, with thousands of armed men on the south, had sworn to kill Huerta for treason and murder, and Villa, with more thousands of armed men on the north, had sworn to take Huerta's life for treason to Mexico. So there is only one safe place for Huerta, and that is under our flag, that would perhaps have mercy on this miserable wretch, who deserves to be overthrown by his own people and punished by his own people for his crimes against them.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to ask him if he thinks that the statement he has just made will be an aid to the mediators in their labors?

Mr. OWEN. I will say, Mr. President, that I do not think the mediators will be able to accomplish anything with a man like Huerta. I will say further, however, that the history which I have put in the RECORD here this afternoon in regard to this man whom we have not recognized, and ought not to recognize, will in no wise affect the question of mediation. The mediators will deal with the questions that are laid before them, but the people of the United States ought to know what manner of man this is that our Government has refused to recognize, and I feel justified in giving the reasons for that refusal.

RESOLUTION STATE OF SONORA.

Special committee.—The executive of the State is pleased to submit to the settlement of the local legislature the present conflict of the State in relation to the supreme executive power of the Republic, the statement whereof appears in the official note referred to the opinion of the undersigned committee. The committee has before it a case which is extraordinary and without precedent in the history of this legislature, and therefore there are no precedents to be consulted in order to enlighten its opinion in the matter, so that in order to express the present opinion we have been obliged to measure its transcendent importance and to consult the laws and opinions which may add light and force to our deficiency in the matter in question, so that we may offer, and submit to the deliberation of this assembly, a proposition which shall emanate from our consciences honestly, patriotically, and calmly.

The axis about which the question propounded turns is the legality or illegality of the appointment of Gen. Victoriano Huerta as provisional President of the Republic. We believe, like the Executive, that the high representative capacity conferred upon the aforesaid Gen. Huerta can not be recognized as constitutional.

As a matter of fact, the apprehension of Messrs. Francisco I. Madero and Jose Maria Pino Suarez, President and Vice President of the Republic, and their cabinet, took place in contravention of article 103 of the constitution of the Republic and the supreme law of May 6, 1904. In these texts it is prescribed that the President and Vice President of the Republic may be impeached only for high treason, express violation of the constitution, attack upon the electoral freedom, and grave offenses in the realm of common law. This provision was violated, for Messrs. Madero and Pino Suarez were apprehended without any impeachment having been made before Congress, which grand jury ought to have decided whether proceedings were to be taken or not against the said officials. From the second of the documents sent as exhibits by the governor of the State it is seen that subsequently it was desired to clothe with a pretended legality the designation of Gen. Huerta by saying that Messrs. Madero and Pino Suarez had resigned their posts; that the presidency had passed to Mr. Lascurain, minister of foreign relations; that the latter had resigned; and that Gen. Huerta had thereupon been designated President. Now that, in our opinion, the culminating point of the question has been defined, it becomes appropriate to connect it with the government of the State of Sonora. The aforementioned article 103 of the federal constitution says that the governors of the States are responsible for infraction of the federal constitution and laws. Would not the recognition of Gen. Huerta as President of the Republic, now that it has been established that said presidency was occupied in express violation of the constitution, imply responsibility on the part of the governor of the State of Sonora? The constitution has been violated, and to approve this violation is to become an accomplice in the crime itself. Now, the undersigned committee believes that it behooves the Executive to make the declaration urgently demanded by the secretary of the interior of the Huerta cabinet according to the last of the exhibits sent to said Executive. But inasmuch as this assembly is in turn confronted with a question of the greatest concern to the destinies of the nation, and as it has a high patriotic duty to perform in these solemn moments of our history, the undersigned committee, on the strength of Section XIII of article 67 of the political constitution of the State, and in view of the statement made by the Executive in the official note serving as a basis for this report, has the honor to propose a bill (draft of a law) of the tenor given below. Honorable chamber, we believe that we have honestly and patriotically fulfilled our duty to pass upon the momentous matter submitted to our opinion. We are firmly convinced that the proposition which we have framed is that which is warranted by the dignity of our State; and if owing to the deficiency of our knowledge there should be any error in the opinion submitted to the most illustrious of you, we at least have the satisfaction of having fulfilled the duties imposed upon us by our conscience. The bill which we submit to the deliberation of the honorable chamber is as follows:

LAW AUTHORIZING THE EXECUTIVE TO REFUSE RECOGNITION TO GEN. VICTORIANO HUERTA AS PRESIDENT OF MEXICO.

ARTICLE 1. The legislature of the free and sovereign State of Sonora does not recognize Gen. Victoriano Huerta as provisional president of the Mexican Republic.

ART. 2. The executive is urged to utilize the powers conferred upon him by the political constitution of the State.

DECREE NO. 1.

ARTICLE 1. The branches of the federal administration are provisionally (placed) in charge of the State and (made) subject to the laws and provisions of the latter.

ART. 2. The making of any payment, for the purposes referred to in the foregoing article, to any office not subject to the executive power of Sonora and existing therein is prohibited.

ART. 3. The said executive power shall provide for the organization and operation of the services belonging to the executive of the Union, attending to everything concerning the branches referred to.

DECREE NO. 2.

ARTICLE 1. The frontier custom houses of Agua Prieta and Nogales are hereby qualified and opened up to international import and export trade.

ART. 2. In all matters contrary to the special laws and provisions of the State there shall be observed the general customs orders of June 12, 1891, and the schedules concerned, together with their additions and revisions in force.

ART. 3. The import duties are reduced 20 per cent and the 5 per cent additional which has been being paid is hereby abolished.

ART. 4. The exportation of cattle and horses shall be assessed as follows:

(a) Cattle, $2.50 a head.
(b) Horses, broken in, $10 per head.
(c) Horses, wild, $5 per head.

I therefore order this printed, published, and circulated for due enforcement.

Given at the palace of the executive of the State, at Hermosillo, March 24, 1913.

IGNACIO L. PESQUEIRA.
LORENZO ROZADO, Secretary General.

NOTE.—This document above is taken from the Diario de los Debates (Journal of Debates), of the City of Mexico, which in turn took it from the Official Gazette, of Sonora, and it was at the permanent session of the legislature of Sonora, held on March 5, that the committee gave the opinion referred to, and it was approved.

MEMORIAL FROM A COMMITTEE REPRESENTING THE PEOPLE OF THE STATES OF PUEBLA AND TLAXCALA TO MR. LIND.

SIR: In our name and in that of the people of the States of Puebla and Tlaxcala, whose general and almost unanimous sentiments we voice, we address you with the request that you bring to the attention of His Excellency Woodrow Wilson the fact that, as a matter of equity and justice, and considering that he has heard the side of public functionaries and sympathizers of the Huerta Government and of some of the rebels in the frontier of our country, as well as the opinions of Americans residing among us, we, as the genuine representatives of the true people, be given a chance to give our views on the political situation of the country, as it would not be in keeping with the well-known sense of justice of His Excellency Woodrow Wilson to listen only to one side and to ignore the opinion of the Mexican people, expressed in divers ways, and which we know is regarded by you as the principal means to guide your opinion concerning the international issue of the day.

We trust that you as well as His Excellency President Wilson will regard this memorial as a mark of courtesy, shown in this way to you, the President of the American Union and the people of the United States, whose Chief Executive we regard as a sincere and great friend of ours.

We abstain on account of official persecution from sending you our credentials as the representatives we claim to be.

Although we feel certain that the Department of State in Washington must be in possession of ample information concerning the present political situation of Mexico, we nevertheless do not consider it officious to refer to the events which took place between the 9th and the 18th of February last, in order that you may hear the opinion of the people on the following points, to wit: 1st. The illegality of the Government of Gen. Huerta; second, the legality of the revolution of the Constitutional Party; and, third, the serious consequences which would naturally follow the recognition of the Huerta Government by that of the United States, and which would tend to definitely establish the same.

THE ILLEGALITY OF THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT.

First. The revolution of 1910 was an act by which the Mexican people invoked the right it had under article 39 of the Constitution of the Republic, which reads as follows:

"ARTICLE 39. The sovereignty of the nation is essentially and originally vested in the people. All public power emanates directly from the people and is instituted for its benefit. The people have at all times the right to alter or modify the form of its government."

If the revolution headed by Gen. Felix Diaz on February 9 had been popular, it would have been legitimate and justified, because then it would have been initiated by the only body of men who, under the constitution had the right to start it—that is, the people—and therefore any Government emanating from a revolution of this kind will be recognized as a legitimate and justifiable Government.

As a matter of fact, the ostensible and apparent authors of the above-mentioned revolution were Gens. Bernardo Reyes, Felix Diaz, Manuel Mondragon, and Gregorio Ruiz, together with other officers of the army, who caused the men in the School of Aspirantes, of one regiment of light artillery, two regiments of mounted artillery, three regiments of cavalry, and the Twentieth Infantry to mutiny.

The people remained in an attitude of expectancy, due to its surprise and lack of organization, but its sympathy was with President Madero, and if it did not go to his rescue it was because the President did not call on the people. It was also because he still had faith in the discipline and loyalty of the rest of the army.

But while it is true that the people did not take up the defense of the Government, it did not join the rebels, for which reason the revolution was strictly military, and for this reason it lacked the sanction of article 39 of the constitution of Mexico. The rebels did ask the people to join them, but they were not in sympathy with it, and therefore the Government which resulted from the movement in question is lacking in constitutional foundation.

Second. Due to the fact that on February 15 of this year, His Excellency Henry Lane Wilson, convened several members of the diplomatic corps in the building of the embassy and informed them of the coming arrival in Mexican waters of several American vessels and transports with troops for landing, and that it was his firm and decided opinion that 3,000 marines would land on Mexican soil and march to the capital, the Mexican Senate, during an extra session held on the above-mentioned day, decided to ask the resignations of the President and Vice President of the Republic. This act was nevertheless unsuccessful.

We inclose herewith copy of the minutes of the session referred to, as inclosure No. 1.

In view of the above failure nine senators went, on the 18th of February last, to the office of the military commander of the City of Mexico, Gen. Victoriano Huerta, in order to induce him or convince him with all kinds of glowing promises to force the above functionaries to resign. Huerta finally acceded, and with his protection and complicity the above-mentioned senators called on President Madero in order to force him to resign. Having failed in their efforts, they called on Gen. Garcia Peña, minister of war, and told him that the army of the nation should depose the President of the Republic, but the honorable general refused to take the hint.

The decision of the Senate to which we have referred, as well as the acts of the nine senators which followed it, are unconstitutional, inasmuch as article 72, nor any other provision of the constitution, empowers the Senate or any of its members to request or force the President of the Republic to resign. Any senator or authority who does not act within the law and commits acts of violence or of a criminal character is criminally responsible for them, even though he may commit them in his capacity as a senator or authority of any character.

Third. The senators and Gen. Huerta having taken note of the firm attitude of the minister of war in favor of the President, Huerta and the senators, considered from that moment as rebellious to the executive power, directed Gen. Aurelio Blanquet to arrest the President and Vice President at the National Palace and to do this in the name of the army.

When this was done Huerta assumed power and sent all over the country the notice appearing as inclosure 2.

The above acts of violence are also unconstitutional inasmuch as they violate the provisions of the constitution of Mexico.

Therefore, the government which emanated from the second revolution is like the Felix Diaz uprising, contrary to the principles sanctioned by the constitution.

Fourth. The transitory government of Gen. Huerta was sanctioned by a pact signed by Huerta and Diaz, the former aided by Lieut. Col. Joaquin Maas and Engineer Enrique Cepeda and the latter by Attorneys Fidencio Hernandez and Rodolfo Reyes.

Both rebel generals agreed through this pact to prevent by all means the reestablishment of the legitimate government represented exclusively by President Madero and Vice President Pino Suarez; and it was also agreed that Gen. Huerta would assume power at the earliest possible convenience. (Huerta had already assumed it on his own authority.)

We inclose herewith a full copy, under Inclosure 3, of the above agreement, called the pact of Ciudadela.

It is evident that in order to establish the government of Gen. Huerta the constitution was completely ignored and supplanted by the Ciudadela agreement, which confined itself to sanction the military uprising, the acts of violence of Gens. Huerta and Blanquet, to depose the President and Vice President of the Republic, to divest them of their investiture, and to permit Huerta to usurp the executive power of the nation.

Things have developed since February 18 in such a way that there is no room for doubting that the above pact has been the directing force of the present government.

In fact, the first clause of the above-mentioned pact indicates without doubt that the murders of Messrs. Madero and Pino Suarez, immediately after the decision of the legislature of the State of Coahuila became known in the capital, and by which decision, dated the 19th of February, Gen. Huerta was not recognized as President of the Republic, were perpetrated with no other purpose than to prevent the reestablishment of the legitimate government.

ALL OF THAT IS CONTRARY TO THE PRINCIPLES SANCTIONED BY THE CONSTITUTION OF THE REPUBLIC.

Such is the origin of the government of Gen. Huerta, and it matters not that 72 hours later they may have attempted to give it a constitutional form, inasmuch as the old principle of international law which reads, "That which is null in principle is void in its effects," and more so if it is borne in mind that the whole thing was done to put into effect the pact of the Ciudadela, which is not, so to say, the Federal pact, which is the fundamental and supreme law of the land.

Now, then, all events from February 18 ahead and which gave rise to the government of Gen. Huerta, and in spite of the claim they make that it is a matter of "consummated facts," are criminal, illegal, and void and they are so considered in article 128 of the Mexican constitution, a provision which to this date seems to have been ignored, notwithstanding its importance as a fundamental law.

The article in question reads as follows:

"ART. 128. The constitution shall not lose its force and vigor, even though because of a rebellion its enforcement may be suspended. In case that by means of a public disturbance a government contrary to the constitution may be established, as soon as the people regains its freedom, the observance of it shall be enforced, and in accordance with it and with the provisions which may have been dictated pursuant to it, all those who may have figured in the government established by the revolution, and those who may have been their accomplices shall be tried."

This shows your excellency the full force of article 128 of the constitution against the government of Gen. Huerta, and this also shows the motives of basis of the constitutional rebellion which is growing in the heart of the people, and which shall not permit the continuation in power of Gen. Huerta, nor any other government emanating from a military rebellion.

Therefore, to make an effort to legitimize or to recognize the international character of a government which has emanated from a military rebellion, simply because of "consummated facts," means to set aside the constitution of Mexico, and to legitimize and recognize a crime which, though it may have been perpetrated, does not fail to be punishable, nor does it cause article 128 of the constitution to be inoperative.

An act of this kind would be the equivalent of recognizing the right of a thief to the thing stolen.

Therefore, the above pretension, being founded on so frail a foundation, is repudiated by morals, civilization, and common law; and for this reason the Washington Government would be responsible of committing a most lamentable moral and legal error should it recognize the government of Gen. Huerta as a legitimate government, and would recognize it as an international entity.

THE LEGITIMACY OF THE REVOLUTION OF THE CONSTITUTIONALISTAS.

First. If the people were lacking in organization at the beginning of the uprising in order to defend the rights they were divested from by the army which overthrew the Executive elected according to the laws, so soon as it has been able to organize itself into a body it has risen in arms against the usurper, invoking the principle sanctioned by article 39 of the constitution.

The above rights are at the base of the revolution and are deeply rooted in the heart of the Mexican people whose attitude tends to prove that neither public opinion nor the mass of the people have ever sanctioned the present Government. There are a few newspapers in the City of Mexico speaking for the Government, but they do not represent the sentiments of the people or of the popular mind; they are voicing purely and simply the personal views of their publishers, all of whom are under the orders of the minister of gobernacion (Urrutia).

Second. The constitutional government of the free and sovereign State of Coahuila, acting in observance of a decree of its legislature, dated February 19, this year, by which the governor of the State was authorized to disregard the Government of Gen. Victoriano Huerta and not to recognize any of the acts emanating from this Government. Article second of the same decree of the legislature of Coahuila authorized the governor to arm troops in order to maintain the constitutional order.

Third. The Legislature of the State of Sonora, legally constituted and acting in accordance with the law, approved a decree by which the Government of Gen. Huerta was not recognized. A copy of the decree is herewith inclosed.

Fourth. Article 128 of the federal constitution vests the people with power and tacitly expects it to defend and maintain the integrity of the laws, when it reads "as soon as the people may recover its liberty."

Two constitutional decrees emanating from two legally constituted governments of two States are a sufficient base for the present revolution of the Constitutional Party. Those two decrees are its legal foundation.

SERIOUS CONSEQUENCES OF THE DEFINITE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE GOVERNMENT OF GEN. V. HUERTA.

In the first place it would establish precedent for all the armies of the world, that they could rise in arms and depose their respective rulers and place themselves in their stead, if they would feel that the recognition of the world would be forthcoming simply on the plea of "consummated facts."

What happened yesterday in Mexico could happen in the future in Germany, Russia, England, or the United States, where, with reference to the latter country, the Republican Party, sympathizing with Porfirista, or Huertista party of Mexico, places President Woodrow Wilson on a parallel with Madero, and says that the spirit of the latter has reincarnated in the American President.

What would happen with the laws of a country if they were at the mercy of the army? What would happen to a country where the army instead of being the support would be the arbiter of the government? What would it mean to relegate the will and laws of the people to the caprice of the army?

In view of the above we believe that the "Mexico case" is of interest not only to our country, but it concerns all other nations. As a matter of precaution and future policy the Government of Gen. Huerta should not be recognized.

We are of the opinion that coup d'état should be suppressed forever, leaving the question of changing or modifying the form of government to the people, as vox populi vox dei.

The third Pan-American Conference, which took place at Rio de Janeiro, took the initiative by recommending that government growing out of an act of violence should not be recognized, and we hope that America may be the first to follow this principle in connection with the "Mexico case."

Besides, the government of Gen. Huerta is politically and financially connected with many European interests. It is stated soto voce, for example, that Mexico will not press the contention about the Clipperton Islands and will allow France to win out in payment of its recognition of the Huerta government.

It appears that it is on this acount that Huerta revoked the appointment he had made of Lio de la Barra, as envoy near the court of Italy.

Spain is being given all kinds of encouragement to acquire practically full control of the land interests of the country.

All of the above acts are an outrage against the Mexican nation and contrary to the Monroe doctrine.

With reference to England, it is well known how important a rôle has been played by Lord Cowdray and to what extent he would rule were the Huerta government to become definitely affirmed.

As a consequence of the above Europe would increase its political, financial, and even military influence in Mexico, much to our detriment and contrary to the Monroe doctrine.

We will therefore propose, as a part of the opinions you may have gathered while here, for the information of His Excellency Woodrow Wilson:

First. That the government of Gen. Huerta be not recognized.

Second. That if Washington recognizes the government of Huerta, it should simultaneously recognize the belligerence of the rebels.

Third. That as a matter of humanity the decree which prevents the exportation of arms, ammunition, and war material to countries south of the United States be revoked temporarily.

We say that this be done as a matter of humanity in order to facilitate the means by which the States of the Mexican Union in hands of the Constitutional Party to pacify the country and avoid further bloodshed.

If otherwise, the Washington Government, acting under a strange moral rule or other motive, would recognize the Huerta Government and refuse to recognize the belligerency of the rebels, such act would serve only to prolong the state of war in this country, as the patriotic elements of the country would never give in nor tolerate the government of General Huerta.

We will say before ending that foreign residents will have the fullest protection from the constitutional rebels, and if the requests of the revolution are granted in full or in part this will serve to bring Mexico and the United States much closer in their diplomatic relations.

Please accept the assurances of our highest consideration.

LAWS RELATING TO THE JUDICIARY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 15578. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 62. The clerk of the Supreme Court, on the 1st day of January in each year, or within 30 days thereafter, shall, on a form prescribed by the Attorney General, make to the Attorney General a return, under oath, of all fees and costs collected by him in cases disposed of at the preceding term or terms of the court, and of all emoluments collected by him, and after deducting from such collections the sum of $6,000 as his annual compensation, and the incidental expenses of his office, including clerk hire, such expenses to be certified by the Chief Justice and audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, shall at the time of making such return pay any surplus that may remain into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 26 for the purpose of offering a short amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] asks unanimous consent to return to page 26 of the bill, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object, and wish to make this statement: We were on that section last Wednesday, and the Members had an opportunity from then until to-day, one entire week, to be ready this morning, the section being held over for amendments to be offered to it if they desired to do so. This morning no amendments were offered. If we were to recur to that section, I have information that several Members here desire to offer amendments to it, and we will be detained here, I do not know how long, but at least during the day, discussing the various amendments that might be proposed to be offered to this section, on which section we have waited an entire week for purposes of amendment. Therefore I object.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection.

Mr. WATKINS. I still reserve the right to object.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, as to the status of this section this morning, I had prepared an amendment to present to the commitee at this particular point. I consulted with my colleague from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] about it, and he said it would be ripe for amendment. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] made the point of no quorum, and while the roll was being called I was temporarily absent from the Chamber on an important matter, and I did not have an idea that this section would be passed before I could return. Now, I am frank to say to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] that my amendment seeks to increase the salary of the district attorney in the northern district of Georgia. I think the amendment has much merit in it. I believe that the committee would agree that this particular officer's salary should be increased in view of the facts that I am able to submit, and I guarantee to the gentleman from Louisiana that I will not take over three minutes in which to present an amendment and the facts, and if the committee does not agree that this officer should receive an increase in his salary that, as far as I am concerned, will end it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] withdraw his objection?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would do so in this particular case if it were not for other cases of the same kind that would come up. The district attorney whose salary the gentleman wishes to increase is now getting a salary of $5,000 a year, which is twice the salary the United States district attorney is getting in my district and much larger than a majority of the salaries. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 63. The salary of the clerks of the circuit courts of appeals shall be $3,500 a year, to be paid in equal proportions quarterly; and they may also retain from the fees and emoluments of their respective offices, after deducting necessary office expenses, including clerk hire, the sum of $500: Provided, That the clerk of the court of the fifth circuit is authorized to pay, out of the fees and emoluments of his office, the necessary expenses incurred by him in transporting from his office in New Orleans to Atlanta, Fort Worth, and Montgomery, and from Atlanta, Fort Worth, and Montgomery to New Orleans, the records, books, papers, files, dockets, and supplies necessary for the use of the court at its terms to be held at Atlanta, Fort Worth, and Montgomery, and an allowance for actual expenses not exceeding $10 a day to cover travel and subsistence for each day he may be required to be present at Atlanta, Fort Worth, or Montgomery on business connected with said office, such expenses and allowance to be approved and allowed by the senior circuit judge of said circuit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. This section fixes the salaries of the clerks of the court at $3,500 and $4,000 a year, and then there is this peculiar proviso, that the clerk in the fifth circuit, the one that it has in New Orleans, shall have $10 a day for subsistence and traveling expenses, and also his necessary expenses in transporting from the office in New Orleans papers to Atlanta, Fort Worth, and Montgomery and back. Now, all of those districts have district courts located at one place, and a number of the circuit courts of appeals meet in different places. Now why should they make a special exception in the case of the clerk at New Orleans which does not extend to the other clerks of the courts of appeals?

Mr. WATKINS. I suppose that is a definite question to which the gentleman wants an answer?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. My answer is this, that the committee did not feel authorized to strike out the existing law. That is a separate and distinct enactment of Congress, and it had for its object a purpose at the time. That purpose is no longer served; but not feeling authorized to strike out the existing law, we have left it as we found it in the existing statute. If the gentleman makes a motion to strike it out, there will be no objection interposed by the committee.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the proviso in section 63.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 8, strike out the proviso, beginning on line 8, down to and including line 21.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, as this is a very important amendment, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixteen Members are present, a quorum. The Clerk will read. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 65. Clerks of the United States circuit courts of appeals, annually and within 30 days after the 30th day of June in each year, shall make a return to the Attorney General of the United States of all the fees and emoluments of their offices, respectively. Such return shall cover all fees and emoluments earned during the preceding year and also the necessary office expenses for such year, including clerk hire. Such expenses, including clerk hire, shall be certified by the senior circuit judge of the proper circuit, and audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department. The respective clerks of the circuit courts of appeals, after deducting such expenses and clerk hire, and the sum of $500, as provided by section 1418, shall, at the time of making such returns, pay into the Treasury of the United States the balance of such fees and emoluments. In case any item of expense, including clerk hire, is not allowed, the amount disallowed shall, within 10 days after notice of disallowance, be paid into the Treasury of the United States. It shall be unlawful for any clerk of a circuit court of appeals to include in his emolument account or return, any fee not actually earned and due at the time such return is required by law to be made; and no fee not actually earned shall be allowed in any such account.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 13, after the word "section," strike out "fourteen hundred and eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty-three."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this is simply to correct a clerical error.

Mr. MANN. It should be "section 63 of this act," should it not?

Mr. WATKINS. That is understood, because it is used that way all the way through.

Mr. MANN. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I notice in other places, where sections are referred to, you use the language "section of this chapter." For instance, on page 29, line 13, "section 7586 of this chapter," which means this act.

Mr. WATKINS. There is no objection to adding that to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The only reason why I call attention to it is that in the original law it referred to a section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. WATKINS. That is correct. An amendment should be added to it, saying, "in this bill."

Mr. MANN. It should be "section 63 of this chapter."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment, after the word "sixty-three" the words "of this chapter."

Mr. WATKINS. That is not quite correct. That refers to section 63 of the bill. There are not 63 sections in this chapter. It should be "in this bill" or "in this act."

Mr. MANN. Say "in this act." I used that word because it said "this chapter" in other places.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "chapter" and insert in lieu thereof the word "act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 8, after the word "subpœnas," strike out the period and insert the words "for witnesses, or for attaching certificate or affixing the seal of the court thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 12, after the word "admission," insert the words "and the entry of the order of admission."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 17, after the word "session," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That mileage shall be allowed the clerk for travel to draw jurors when such travel is made by the clerk under the order of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. As to this new provision, inserted at the top of page 34, I suppose that is in relation to the stenographers?

Mr. WATKINS. Not particularly; no, sir. I think that refers to any transcript that is made. The commission thought it was safe to put that in there, because there was a question raised as to whether they would be able to pay for transcripts.

Mr. MANN. Why should these costs be taxed against the United States?

Mr. WATKINS. For this reason: There are some cases that arise, for instance, in the cases of paupers, where that would be advisable; and we have already passed, in one of these amendments, a provision that where the parties were not able to appeal and make a showing to the court that they were not able to pay the costs, that would be done. And whenever the aggregate of the clerk's costs amounts to over $5,000, under this provision the clerk gets $5,000 for his salary; but where the aggregate does not amount to that, it is less than $5,000, and that was counted as a part of his earnings.

Mr. MANN. So that the effect of this is practically to tax the costs against the Government in those cases where the ordinary fees do not pay the full salary of the clerk?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In other cases it would be paid in and paid back to the Government.

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 67. No clerk of a district court shall be allowed by the Attorney General, except as provided in the next succeeding section, to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office, including fees in naturalization proceedings and for admission to practice, for his personal compensation, over and above his necessary office expenses, including necessary clerk hire, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, a sum exceeding $5,000 a year, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WATKINS. I have a committee amendment which I should like to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 23, strike out the section and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"No clerk of a district court shall be allowed by the Attorney General, except as provided in the next succeeding section and under section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906, entitled 'An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States,' to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office, including the fees for admission of attorneys to practice, for his personal compensation, over and above his necessary office expenses, including necessary clerk hire, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, a sum exceeding $5,000 a year, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year."

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, when I moved to strike out the last word, I intended to ask the gentleman in regard to this naturalization. I am afraid that the gentleman's amendment does not cover the case. As I understand it, the amendment only makes an exception of a section in the immigration and naturalization act; but there have been several provisions since, carried in appropriation acts, in relation to clerk-hire services in naturalization cases. The immigration act is uncertain and doubtful as to its meaning on this subject. The naturalization cases in New York and Chicago were practically held up, and we passed a new provision in one of the appropriation acts—I think it was in an appropriation act—and that was not successful. Then, if I remember correctly, we passed another provision in another appropriation act, although I am not sure of that, before we got the question of clerk hire in naturalization cases disposed of. Now, I am afraid, if this provision goes in in the way it is and becomes a law, the result will be that you can not naturalize citizens over in New York after you have naturalized a certain number. Unless the gentleman has examined that recent legislation carefully, I would suggest to him that he pass this over and look that up.

Mr. WATKINS. I have no objection at all to doing that, but we tried to thrash that out, and went over it as carefully as we possibly could, and then finally submitted it to the Department of Justice.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman would submit it to the Bureau of Naturalization, he would probably get a great deal more information than he could from the Department of Justice.

Mr. WATKINS. If we could get any more light on the subject and make it any more accurate, I should be willing to pass this over and get further information about it; but we went over this with extra care, so as to get this particular section, as we thought, in proper shape.

Mr. MANN. I remember very distinctly that after the immigration and naturalization act became a law it provided that a certain amount might be used for the payment of clerk hire from the fees that came from the naturalization business; and naturalization stopped in a number of the courts, because it was impossible to do the work without extra clerk hire, and they reached the limit under that act. Since then, as I say, we have had one or two acts in reference to the subject in some of the appropriation acts. I think it would be wise for the gentleman to consult the Bureau of Naturalization on the subject before putting this into the law.

Mr. WATKINS. I have no objection to allowing the amendment to be pending and to pass it over temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that request?

Mr. WATKINS. That it be passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD. Does this require unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the section with the amendment pending be passed over. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, this is a very important bill. Everybody seems to be anxious to get through with it, and everybody seems to be anxious to get home. I do not think we ought to go home before we pass this important bill. That seems to be the serious intention of the serious statesmen of this House.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman voted to consider it. I did not.

Mr. WINGO. No; I voted my convictions on the parliamentary situation.

Mr. MANN. That was not a conviction.

Mr. WINGO. I call attention to the fact that there is no quorum present, and make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. I compliment the gentleman. You never can bother me by making the point of no quorum, but if gentlemen do not stop filibustering pretty soon I shall be obliged to call attention to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty Members present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called; that 252 Members had answered to their names; and he reported a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, at the time the point of no quorum was made there was a request pending to pass over section 67, with reference to the fees of clerks.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the gentleman from Louisiana has offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WATKINS. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to offer an amendment as a substitute for the gentleman's amendment. Will it be for consideration now, or does the gentleman wish to have the section passed over without further consideration?

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will offer his amendment, I will then renew my request to have it passed over.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I will offer the amendment and ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading at the present time, and that I may make a short statement in regard to the nature of it.

The substitute which I offer is, in substance, a bill introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. CLAYTON]. It is a bill that was well considered and was, as I understand, unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee. Under the present system and the gentleman's amendment the clerk and the deputy clerk are paid by fees, which I think, it is unnecessary to argue, is a thing we should abolish if possible.

It was with that object in view that this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]. It fixes definitely the salary of all clerks ranging from $2,500 to $4,500, according to the various districts and according to the amount of work it is supposed they will do. It provides that all fees shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. It is a well-considered bill, and I think ought to be substituted for the present iniquitous system which practically pays all clerks $5,000 a year, and allows it to be paid out of the fees of the office in such a manner that complaint is continually being made all over the country in regard to the practical operation of the law. I ask that this amendment may be printed and considered when the section comes up for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his amendment be printed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that this section be passed over.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. If this request is agreed to, when the section is considered again will other amendments be in order, or will only these two amendments be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. If the section is passed over by unanimous consent, when it comes up again for consideration it will be subject to other amendments.

Mr. WINGO. It comes up de novo?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the amendment offered by Mr. TOWNER:

That all fees and emoluments authorized by law to be paid to clerks of United States district courts shall be charged as heretofore, and shall be collected by said clerks and covered into the Treasury of the United States; that it shall be the duty of all clerks of United States district courts to require payment in advance for services to be rendered by them otherwise than for the United States, except where the person requiring the services is relieved by law from prepayment of fees and costs; and that, subject to this limitation, the clerk shall account quarterly for all fees and emoluments earned within the quarter last preceding such accounting, and for all fees and emoluments received within the quarter which had been earned prior thereto: Provided, That the portion of the fees which the naturalization law allows clerks of the United States district courts to retain shall be accounted for to the United States, and be included in the quarterly accounting for naturalization fees required by law to be made, except that upon the approval of the Secretary of Commerce a clerk of any United States court collecting naturalization fees in excess of $6,000 in the fiscal year 1914, or in any fiscal year thereafter, may retain so much of $3,000 of naturalization fees in the following fiscal year as may be necessary to pay for the clerical assistants, for naturalization purposes only, which clerks of courts are required to employ by section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 596); and said clerks shall be paid for their official services salaries and compensation hereinafter provided, and not otherwise: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to require or authorize fees to be charged against or collected from the United States.

SEC. 3. That the clerk of the district court, when attending court at any place other than his official residence, and when otherwise necessarily absent from his official residence on official business, shall be allowed his necessary expenses for lodging and subsistence, not exceeding $4 per day, and his actual necessary traveling expenses. An account of such expenses shall be made quarterly, in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Attorney General, and shall be verified on oath before any officer authorized to administer oaths: Provided, That said account for expenses shall have attached thereto the certificate of the district judge that the expenses charged were incurred when attending court at a place other than the official residence of the clerk or when otherwise necessarily absent from his official residence on official business. The expense accounts of the clerks, when made out and certified in accordance with this act, shall be paid by the marshal, who shall make such return thereof as may be prescribed by the Attorney General.

SEC. 4. That the necessary office expenses of the clerks of the United States district courts shall be allowed when authorized by the Attorney General. And when in the opinion of the Attorney General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the clerk, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions showing necessity for the same, allow the clerk to employ necessary deputies and clerical assistants, upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney General from time to time and paid as hereinafter provided. When any of such deputies or clerical assistants is necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment on official business he shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only and his necessary and actual expenses for lodging and subsistence, not to exceed $3 per day. And he shall make and render accounts thereof quarterly, in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Attorney General, and shall be verified on oath before any officer authorized to administer oaths: Provided, That said accounts for expenses shall have attached thereto the certificate of the clerk that the expenses charged were incurred by the deputy or clerical assistant when necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment on official business. SEC. 5. That all salaries provided by this act shall be paid monthly by the United States marshals for the several districts under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Attorney General.

SEC. 7. That any clerk of a United States district court whose compensation is fixed by section 2 of this act who shall directly or indirectly demand, receive, or accept any compensation for the performance of any official service as such clerk other than is herein provided, or shall willfully fail or neglect to account for or pay over any fees or emoluments collected by him, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 8. That no clerk or deputy clerk of a district court of the United States, or other person employed in such clerk's office shall be appointed a receiver or master in any case whatsoever.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARSHALS' FEES.

SEC. 71. For service of any warrant, attachment, summons, capias, or other writ, except execution, venire, or a summons or subpœna for a witness, $2 for each person on whom service is made.

For the keeping of personal property attached on mesne process, such compensation as the court, on petition setting forth the facts under oath, may allow.

For serving venires and summoning every 12 men as grand or petit jurors, $4, or 33⅓ cents each.

For holding a court of inquiry or other proceedings before a jury, including the summoning of a jury, $5.

For serving a writ of subpœna on a witness, 50 cents; and no further compensation shall be allowed for any copy, summons, or notice for a witness.

For serving a writ of possession, partition, execution, or any final process, and for making the service, seizing or levying on property, a fee of $2, and the same mileage as is allowed for the service of any other writ; and for advertising and disposing of the same by sale, set-off, or otherwise according to law receiving and paying over the money, a fee of $2, and a commission of 2½ per cent on any sum under $500, and 1½ per cent on the excess of any sum over $500.

For each bail bond, 50 cents.

For summoning appraisers, 50 cents each.

For executing a deed prepared by a party or his attorney, $1.

For drawing and executing a deed, $5.

For copies of writs or papers furnished at the request of any party, 10 cents a folio.

For every proclamation in admiralty, 30 cents.

For serving an attachment in rem or a libel in admiralty, $2.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would ask the gentleman whether the insertion here in reference to the commission on sales, and so forth, is what the existing law provides—

One and one-fourth per cent on the excess of any sum over $500.

Is that the same, or is it an increase or a decrease in the fees for making a sale?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I think that is the same as in other cases. It is the same as in admiralty cases. I think this item in this particular class of cases is the same allowed in similar cases.

Mr. MANN. This particular class of cases covers all of the sales that the marshal makes. If he sells a railroad for several million dollars, a percentum of 1¼ per cent is rather a large fee. What I want to know is whether this is increasing his fees or decreasing his fees or giving him the same amount he gets now, or whether it is a change of law in any other respect?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, as far as my recollection goes, it is the same.

Mr. MANN. It is inserted here as new matter.

Mr. WATKINS. Oh, yes; that is recommended by the commission.

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether it was recommended by the commission or not.

Mr. WATKINS. That is the reason it is printed in italic.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that a commission of 1¼ per cent on a sale of some millions of dollars is a very large commission.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the chairman of the committee a question for information. I call his attention to the first paragraph in section 71, which provides for the service of any warrant, attachment, summons, and so forth, or summons or subpœna for a witness, $2, and then further down, in line 14, there is a provision that for serving a writ of subpœna upon a witness the fee shall be 50 cents. What is the distinction?

Mr. WATKINS. The language in line 14 refers simply to a summons that is served on a witness to come into court, and the other refers to the process which is served under order of the court.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, if an ordinary subpœna is issued for a witness by the clerk, upon the customary order having been made, he gets only 50 cents?

Mr. WATKINS. That is right.

Mr. WINGO. But if the court during the pendency of a case orders a subpœna from the bench, he gets $2 for it?

Mr. WATKINS. That is right.

Mr. WINGO. Why the distinction?

Mr. WATKINS. I do not make the distinction. The original law enacted by Congress makes the distinction. We have simply left it there, because there may be cases where it would entail greater responsibility on the part of the officer, or because of the fact that it may be more technical and more difficult to attend to that class of work. It is established law, and has been from time immemorial.

Mr. WINGO. The object I had in mind in making the inquiry was to ascertain why the distinction is made. I have never yet been able to ascertain.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 72. The United States marshal for each judicial district of the United States shall be paid, in lieu of all fees, per cents, and other compensation, an annual salary as follows: For the northern and middle districts of the State of Alabama, each, $4,000; for the southern district of the State of Alabama, $3,000; for the district of Arizona, $4,000; for the eastern and western districts of Arkansas, each, $4,000; For the northern and southern districts of California, each, $4,000; For the district of Colorado, $4,000; for the district of Connecticut, $2,500; for the district of Delaware, $2,000; for the District of Columbia, $5,500; for the northern and southern districts of Florida, each, $3,000; for the northern district of Georgia, $5,000; for the southern district of Georgia, $3,500;

For the district of Idaho, $4,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman will notice that the salary of the marshal for the district of Connecticut is fixed at $2,500. My recollection is that we passed a law increasing that salary.

Mr. WATKINS. The gentleman is correct. It was increased from $2,000 to $2,500.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that was the increase and this carries the law?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 75. Each field deputy marshal shall, as his compensation, receive the gross fees, including mileage, as provided in section 71, earned by him, not to exceed $1,500 per fiscal year or at that rate for any part of a fiscal year; and, in addition, shall be allowed his actual necessary expenses, not exceeding $2 a day, while endeavoring to arrest, under process, a person charged with or convicted of crime: Provided, That a field deputy may elect to receive actual expenses on any trip in lieu of mileage: Provided further. That in special cases, where in his judgment justice requires, the Attorney General may make an additional allowance, not, however, in any case to make the aggregate annual compensation of any field deputy in excess of $2,500 nor more than the gross fees earned by such field deputy: Provided further, That field deputies shall be paid by the United States for services rendered and expenses incurred in serving and executing process in behalf of parties prosecuting or defending actions in forma pauperis, as provided by law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is the gentleman quite sure of the effect of that last proviso, that field deputies shall be paid by the United States in pauper cases?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to it at all. It is recommended, and there ought to be some remuneration for it.

Mr. MANN. I can see that if the deputy needs that money to make up his salary, that is one thing; but apparently this is a direct provision that the United States shall pay to these deputies fees in pauper cases, and they shall get their salaries besides. A deputy marshal gets a salary, which is dependent also upon the fees that he earns and that are collected for the Government. His salary is paid out of those fees. I am correct about that, am I not?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; a field deputy marshal.

Mr. MANN. Having provided that, you add a proviso that field deputies shall be paid by the United States for service rendered and expenses incurred in serving and executing process in pauper cases. Would not that be an addition to the salaries that they receive?

Mr. WATKINS. That was once submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury, and I will read what the committee report states with reference to it. I read from part 1 of the report of the committee on this bill:

Section 75: A provision is added to section 11 of the act of May 28, 1896, authorizing the payment by the United States of fees in cases prosecuted or defended in forma pauperis. This is in view of a decision of a Comptroller of the Treasury that field deputies are not entitled to fees in such cases, which is considered by the commission as a manifest hardship, since the United States requires them to perform the services. Otherwise the section is identical with the law.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the comptroller decides the question that I am raising. The purpose the commission had in the language undoubtedly was to count these fees in determining what the deputy marshal might receive. The deputy marshal might be engaged in doing nothing else but serving writs, and so forth, in pauper cases, and would not receive any salary at all unless the Government paid it to him; but here you have already the provision that he shall be paid a certain salary out of his fees, and then, in addition, apparently, he is to be paid by the Government for serving the process in pauper cases.

Mr. WATKINS. There is no objection to changing those words "there shall be" to "shall charge" or any other suitable language.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the best form of language would be.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the field deputy marshals are paid from fees exclusively, not to exceed $1,500, and that is to be measured by the gross fees received by the deputy marshal. It occurs to me that if these pauper fees were received by him they would be necessarily included in the gross fees, and that therefore they could not be added to the amount of $1,500 which he would receive if the fees amounted to that.

Mr. MANN. Well, I should question that. Here is the first provision that he shall receive out of the fees earned by him not to exceed $1,500 per annum. Then you provide, in addition to that, that the United States shall pay him the fees in the pauper cases.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, that would be subject to that interpretation unless it should be held, of course, that the fees included what he received from the pauper cases, and of course that could be cured by an amendment in either event.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say it was supposed the last verbiage, "as provided by law," would safeguard it, but if the gentleman desires to safeguard the expression by placing in the language "or charged by," or any other language that will express it better, I have no objection, because we did not want him to get any more than the salary.

Mr. MANN. "Provided by law" only refers to the definition of what are pauper cases.

Mr. WATKINS. I thought it referred back to the charges.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Thirty-five Members are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

R. 15578, and finding itself without a quorum he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 223 Members responded to their names, and he reported back the list of absentees to be recorded in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee has had under consideration the bill H. R. 15578, and finding itself without a quorum, under the rules he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 223 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he reports the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal. The committee will resume its sitting.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 76. There shall be paid to the marshal his reasonable actual expenses for the maintenance of prisoners of the United States confined in jail for any criminal offense; also his expenses necessarily incurred for fuel, light, and other contingencies that may accrue in holding the courts within his district and providing the books necessary to record the proceedings thereof: Provided, That he shall not incur or be allowed in any one year an expense of more than $20 for furniture or $50 for rent of a building and making improvements thereon, without first submitting a statement and estimates to the Attorney General and getting his instructions in the premises.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great desire throughout the country for information in regard to the policy of the President in reference to Mexico. From an article which I hold in my hand, printed in the New York Sun of to-day, it seems to be largely explained——

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield? I missed the first part of his statement. Is this news matter or an editorial?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why, it is partly both—an editorial, quoting from a magazine article.

Mr. MURDOCK. I missed the first part of the gentleman's statement, on account of the disorder.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. A certain William Bayard Hale has published a work on "Our Moral Empire in America," and in the prospectus, among other things, occurs this language:

Dr. Hale went to Mexico City to investigate the character of the Huerta régime. He remained three months, returning to Washington with a report which, according to common belief, decided President Wilson to refuse recognition to the Huerta government.

So, if he states the facts we have now at last an explanation of the attitude of the President. While he was so sensitive to foreign opinion and foreign judgment in regard to the Panama Canal that he asked the repeal of the tolls provision because it did not meet with the approval of foreign Governments, yet, upon the judgment of this one man, he stood against the combined judgment of the world, with the exception of three nations, in refusing to recognize Huerta. Here is another paragraph:

Later, Dr. Hale visited the revolutionary chiefs in northern Mexico and held a series of conferences with Gen. Carranza and his staff; these conferences were followed shortly afterwards by the abolition of the embargo on arms and munitions of war, which had placed the revolutionists at a disadvantage.

This also explains the great confidence and admiration of the administration for the splendid heroes that have been devastating and murdering in northern Mexico.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that President Taft also refused to recognize Huerta, and is it not a fact that the Governments of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile also refused, and did Dr. Hale have anything to do with that?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. As I recall, the Taft administration was in power less than two weeks after Huerta took control of Mexico, but President Taft did not send special personal agents instead of regular accredited representatives to Mexico. That brings me to the point I want to make and that is this: Who is this Dr. Hale whom the President follows if the prospectus to his book, of course prepared, or at least approved, by himself, states the truth. He is a divorced expreacher who left the pulpit to go to muckraking. He is an expert on the scandalous, the unsavory, and the yellow. He is the author of a lot of disparaging, discreditable, and untrue articles which have appeared in magazines attacking different industries and some public institutions, and yet this is the man, if we are to believe his own statement, that is the confidential adviser of the President, and the man upon whose judgment the President of the United States proposes to expend millions of dollars of money and sacrifice thousands of lives of American and Mexican citizens.

It is a most serious statement to be spread broadcast over this country by a man of Dr. Hale's character, to help sell his book. There is so much secrecy and mystery about the administration's policy in Mexico that such statement may mislead many.

If it is true that the President did rely upon Dr. Hale's statement, if he did look upon Mexican affairs through this yellow medium, then it is no longer a matter of surprise that our policy in regard to that unhappy country has been weak, hesitating, and discreditable. A muckraker should not dictate the affairs of Mexico.

Now, if these discreditable statements are not true, the President ought to deny it. This gentleman ought not to be permitted, for advertising purposes, to parade before the country that he is advising the President of the United States. His record is not such as to inspire confidence. As I said before upon the floor of this House, this gentleman in his action in reference to Mexico was not accredited to this country nor a credit to the country.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What industries did he attack?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know all of them. I know he attacked the Pension Department for one, and when it was investigated it was found every statement that he made was either wholly untrue or misleading.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman said not only institutions, but industries. Did he attack the shipping industry?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, I do not know. But I want to ask the gentleman what he thinks of the character of a gentleman, a divorced preacher, who leaves his pulpit and goes into muckraking, and then parades over the country that he is the adviser of the President of the United States in order to sell one of his books?

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks for the purpose of inserting an editorial——

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I object.

Mr. MANN. Are you afraid of it?

Mr. WILSON of Florida. No; but we have had enough of it.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to inquire if there is anything in the rule that would prevent an excellent gentleman—the gentleman from Washington—from associating with political scarecrows until he frightens himself to death?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The entire editorial in the New York Sun is interesting and illuminating, so I will put it all in the RECORD.

MORAL EMPIRE AND WAR FOR THE SERVICE OF MANKIND.

Those who, like the Evening Post of this town, approve warmly of "the President's idealism," yet find that idealism "hard to understand," will do well to study the new idea of war for the service of mankind in the light of Mr. William Bayard Hale's prospectus of "Our Moral Empire in America," published in the World's Work for May. We have already spoken of Mr. Hale's leading part in shaping events toward a war for the service of mankind. The subjoined certificate of actual participation in the Mexican policy of the administration precede his general remarks on moral empire and stamp them, so to speak, with the seal of authority:

"Dr. Hale went to Mexico City to investigate the character of the Huerta régime. He remained three months, returning to Washington with a report which, according to common belief, decided President Wilson to refuse recognition to the Huerta Government.

"Later Dr. Hale visited the revolutionary chiefs in northern Mexico and held a series of conferences with Gen. Carranza and his staff; these conferences were followed shortly afterwards by the abolition of the embargo on arms and munitions of war, which had placed the revolutionists at a disadvantage."

From this it is apparent that not only the implacable determination to recognize the Huerta government in no event whatsoever, but also the decision to supply Carranza and Villa with arms and ammunition, resulted from the investigations and observations of Mr. William Bayard Hale in Mexico. Indeed, the President's unofficial envoy or emissary frankly admits that he is responsible for all that has grown or may grow out of his unfavorable report to Mr. Wilson concerning Gen. Huerta's character. He says:

"The way to make the business of 'promoting' revolutions unprofitable is to see to it that 'promoted' revolutions do not succeed. [Mr. Hale is referring to Huerta's revolution, not to Carranza's.]

"This is what Mr. Wilson is aiming at, if I understand aright. It would not, of course, be possible for a nation which was itself born in revolution to take the position that all efforts of oppressed men to abolish the forms to which they have been accustomed and to institute a new government must be discountenanced. Therefore it is necessary to scrutinize each revolution by itself and to judge whether it be, or be not, morally justifiable."

Accordingly Mr. William Bayard Hale went to Mexico under instructions from President Wilson and scrutinized the Huerta revolution and decided that it was not morally justifiable, and so reported; and Huerta was not recognized and the two nations came to the point of bloodshed for that reason.

Accordingly, also, Mr. William Bayard Hale went into the northern States of Mexico and scrutinized Carranza and Pancho Villa and decided that their revolution was morally justifiable, and so reported; and the embargo was raised and Carranza and Villa were provided with guns and gunpowder with which to kill thousands of Mexicans identified with the earlier but less moral revolution.

Mr. William Bayard Hale continues:

"That duty—of scrutinizing each revolution by itself and judging whether it be or be not morally justifiable—the United States has now assumed, as I understand it, or, indeed, as anyone can see. When Mr. Wilson took steps to inform himself of the facts regarding the Huerta coup d'état, with a view to passing a moral judgment upon the rightfulness of the de facto government in Mexico City, he took, it seems to me, the most far-reaching and fateful step which the Monroe doctrine has inspired in all the process of its evolution."

Manifestly far-reaching, manifestly fateful. For neither in our organic law is there any authority, nor in our national experience is there any precedent, for the establishment of Mr. William Bayard Hale's moral empire, to be enforced by President Wilson's system of moral warfare for the service of mankind. The expenditure of millions of dollars, perhaps the sacrifice of thousands of human lives, depend upon the accuracy of the moral judgment on which Executive action is based; and this moral judgment in its turn depends upon the report of the private informant sent to scrutinize the revolution—in the present case Mr. William Bayard Hale.

What an awful responsibility both for the informant and the informed. As to the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State in the present administration, Mr. William Bayard Hale does not even mention his name while explaining in World's Work the genesis of the moral empire and the beginning of war for the service of mankind.

Mr. HARDY. I wish to inject one or two remarks right here. It is an easy thing for the gentleman from Washington or any gentleman from anywhere to get up here and make various and sundry charges about somebody who is far away. I believe that this country is not ready now to accept the charges or insinuations of the gentleman from Washington to the effect that the President has relied upon a discredited agent to furnish information to him with reference to any of the administrative duties he is about to perform or seeks to perform. I believe that such charges, coming as they do, constitute the worst kind of muckraking that can be presented to the public.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did not make those charges. That is what Dr. Hale himself said in the prospectus of his book.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I think we understand what the gentleman said. He read a newspaper article, and from that made charges and inferences that the President of the United States was relying for information upon a discredited agent. Now, so far as all of it is concerned, I know nothing. I do not know what paper he read from, nor do I care; but I have confidence enough in the President of the United States, and the country has confidence enough, to set it over against the charges and insinuations of the gentleman from Washington and rest perfectly content that the President's character is not even impugned by the charges. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter here from a constituent of mine—a very prominent Democrat, by the way—in which he states:

> You have doubtless heard a great deal of the law's delays.

We have all heard of the law's delays; but, of course, the writer of this letter did not know that there would be three long, tiresome, "no-quorum" roll calls to-day on this bill—a bill designed to correct some of the paragraphs in our laws that make delay in law procedure and great and unnecessary cost to litigants.

The writer of this letter says:

> I want to call your attention to some extravagance in legal proceedings that is amazing, and it seems that the same should be remedied.

Mr. Chairman, we have just finished reading 20 pages of items pertaining to costs in the Federal courts—marshals' costs, clerks' costs, and so forth. Soon will come pages providing for printers' costs, stenographers' costs, mileage costs, and still other costs, which some one must pay.

In this letter my correspondent goes on to state the method of getting cases up to the higher courts in the State of Washington, and then says:

> This practice or something similar is what I believe we should have in cases on appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals.

He says:

> When we appeal to that court the entire record is first written from the stenographer's notes, making a complete record similar to that in the State court; then the transcript goes to the clerk of the district court, who compares it. In other words, he reads it over, and in the case to which I am about to refer this fee costs us in the neighborhood of $100. We have already paid another $100 or more for the typewriting to the reporter. Then the clerk of the lower court sends the transcript of the evidence and pleadings to the clerk of the circuit court of appeals, and he prints the whole business and binds it in book form.
> I have just appealed a case to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, sitting at San Francisco, and am just in receipt of two statements for printing. One is for the evidence, and the charge is more than $700, and one is for the transcript of pleadings, which amounts to more than $300—the total printing bill, as estimated by the clerk, being a little over $1,100.
> Thus you will see that in preparing the record in this case on appeal, which case only involved $6,500, we have already been compelled to expend over $1,300 to get into court. You can readily see that it takes a man almost with the instincts of a gambler to have the nerve to appeal a case to the circuit court of appeals, and you can further see that a poor man would be absolutely prohibited from appealing his case on account of this excessive charge.

The writer, Robert E. Evans, goes on and mentions other charges at considerable length. He goes carefully into the detail of these expenses, such as are being considered in this legislation. I had hoped that this bill would do something toward striking down the law's delays and the excessive costs.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I will be very glad to.

Mr. COX. It occurs to me that you are striking at a very vital point. I have myself had some experience along the same line. Does the gentleman make any suggestions as to a remedy?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. COX. I wish the gentleman would read them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Attorney Evans says in the beginning of his letter, which I dropped, this:

> In going up to the higher courts in the State, typewritten copies can go up, three in number.

Mr. COX. Instead of having typewritten copies printed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; instead of having 12 or more printed copies in cases appealed to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is exactly right. It has always seemed to me like a bunko game to require that printing to be done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Indiana say so, in view of the fact that I myself am somewhat inexperienced in connection with the modes of legal procedure here and in view of the fact that every Member of Congress must know that in the last 20 pages of the bill under consideration are dozens of paragraphs which will simply continue these excessive costs of all kinds. I hope at the opportune time to move to strike them out or that some one else will do so.

Mr. COX. What valid reason can be assigned for the fact that the typewritten record, as clear as print, should be reprinted? I have never seen the philosophy of it in all my life.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the gentleman knows that that is not a matter of law.

Mr. COX. It is simply a rule in the courts.

Mr. MANN. The Supreme Court recently revised the rules of equity procedure, and President Taft in the last Congress and I think President Wilson in this Congress have recommended that the law rules be revised. Of course, each member of the Supreme Court must have a copy of the record in some shape. I suppose the first thing to do, to cut down expenses, would be to limit the lawyer's salary or fee in this and other cases, and then limit the cost of making up the record.

Mr. COX. No; I do not think that would be right.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the proposition to limit the lawyer's salary would not meet with much approval in this Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We are not all lawyers. I, for instance, am a printer.

Mr. COX. I am of this opinion, because I have in my experience had to go up against this same question, and I have never been able to see the reason why these typewritten copies should be printed. The stenographer in transcribing his notes can just as easily make carbon copies, which are easy to read, as to have them printed. The present practice is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This lawyer writes me further:

> There is no reason under the sun why this record should be printed at all. The only purpose I can see of it is to give work to the printer and fees to the clerk. The circuit court of appeals consists of three judges, and it seems to me that if a typewritten transcript of the evidence and the record is sufficient in the State supreme court, where we have nine judges, that the same practice ought to be good enough for the circuit court of appeals, especially in view of the fact of the immense expense now required to appeal a case, and all that they need is a copy of the evidence to read over. I consider it an outrage under the practice at the present time, and I can not for the life of me see why the circuit court of appeals requires this printing.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It would seem from that portion of the letter that the printers were beating the lawyers. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, I do not know; but it makes no difference. We hear on all sides something of the high cost of living, and it is every man's duty to try to strike down these excessive charges. Most people believe that the clerks of Federal courts are overpaid, through fees or otherwise. Court fees pile up unnecessarily. Everybody knows this; the lawyers know it; the printers know it. Neither lawyers nor printers want unfair fees; but when we let such bills as this be used as a buffer for some sort of legislative filibuster, which I confess I can not figure out, and let all such paragraphs as we have heard read to-day go undiscussed and unchallenged, we may be sure that the backs of litigants will continue to bend under the load of "costs," which may include almost everything under the sun.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, on hearing the reading and consideration of the bill, I notice that large appropriations are authorized for the payment of fees, and, looking at an article in the paper, the Washington Herald, of Monday, the 11th of May, I notice that under the present working of the tariff law there is a decrease of revenue and an increase of deficit. I would like to call the attention of the House to one or two extracts in this paper showing the workings of the law. I read:

SIX MONTHS' OPERATION—INCREASED IMPORTS OFFSET BY DECREASES IN RECEIPTS, EXPORTS OF MATERIALS, AND SLOWING DOWN OF FACTORIES.

The official record for the first half year of the tariff law's operation is now available, the Department of Commerce's statement of imports and exports for March completing the figures for six months.

OFFICIAL STATISTICS.

The value of finished manufactures imported in the six months' operation of the law, October 1 to April 1, is $228,000,000, against $215,000,000 in the same period of last year; the value of manufacturers' material imported is $469,000,000, against $517,000,000; the value of manufactures exported is $541,000,000, against $582,000,000; and the receipts from customs are but $140,000,000, against $165,000,000 in the same months of last year.

Meantime the deficit in the Treasury accounts continues to mount, Saturday's official statement showing the "excess of ordinary disbursements" for the fiscal year is $37,097,955, as against an "excess of revenue receipts" of $7,395,706 for the same period of the last fiscal year when the Payne tariff was in operation; or, to put it in ordinary terms, a deficit of $37,000,000 this fiscal year against a surplus of $7,500,000 at this time last year. The administration is depending on the income tax to pull it out of the hole.

On the other hand, the exports of domestic products have steadily fallen, the figures for October, 1913, having been $269,000,000, and in March, 1914, but $184,000,000.

The imports in the six months increased over 37 per cent, while the exports decreased over 31 per cent in the same period. In the last month of the Payne tariff—September, 1913—the exports of domestic products exceeded the imports by $45,000,000; in March, 1914, the sixth month under the Underwood tariff, the exports of domestic products exceeded the imports by barely $1,000,000.

Standing alone the new tariff law is not proving the great success claimed for it by its author and those favoring its passage. It has not proven the boom to business claimed for it. It has not affected the high cost of living. If it has had any beneficial effect to business or the country, it is not apparent so far. Perhaps its benefits will appear later. We are all "watchfully waiting." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 79. No part of the appropriations made for the payment of fees for United States marshals or clerks shall be used to pay the fees of United States marshals or clerks upon any writ or bench warrant for the arrest of any person or persons who may be indicted by any United States grand jury, or against whom an information may be filed, where such person or persons is or are under a recognizance taken by or before any United States commissioner, or other officer authorized by law to take such recognizance, requiring the appearance of such person or persons before the court in which such indictment is found or information is filed, and when such recognizance has not been forfeited, or said defendant is not in default, unless the court in which such indictment or information is pending orders a warrant to issue; nor shall any part of any money appropriated be used in payment of a per diem compensation to any clerk for attendance in court, except for days when the court is opened by the judges for business, the judge being present, which fact shall be certified in the approval of their accounts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some interest to the debate which arose from the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the reply of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

I happen to live within 19 miles of the place where the Rev. William Bayard Hale formerly preached. He preached in the town of Middleboro. He left the pulpit there; but before leaving, he wrote some articles in regard to the factory tenements of the city in which I live. Those articles were discredited entirely by the people of the community and by the corporation that owned the tenements about which he wrote.

After they had called his attention to the matter and he had paid no attention to it, the attention of the proprietor of the World's Work was called to the matter, and he was asked if he would allow a correction of the misstatements that were made therein. The reply was that they published a magazine and hired parties to write articles for it, and they did not publish anything that went to show that the writers of their articles did not state the facts. At the time, or shortly after the Sherwood pension bill was enacted into law——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the gentleman think that as fair a man as the gentleman from Massachusetts is, who is seldom seen or heard doing things out of order, should follow the example of those who violate the rules of parliamentary practice?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not want to listen to any speech. I thought you wanted to ask a question.

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes; it is a query.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Well, make it.

Mr. DONOVAN. As the gentleman from Massachusetts at his time of life——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The gentleman need not have any worry about my time of life. I am quite as capable of taking care of myself as the gentleman is.

Mr. DONOVAN. But the gentleman——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I decline to yield further.

Mr. DONOVAN. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the question before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And shortly after the passage of the Sherwood pension bill one of my constituents called me to account for voting for that bill.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman is not talking to the question before the committee, which is section 79 on page 47 of the bill. He is talking to a pro forma amendment. He can only explain matters pertaining to this particular section. I feel sorry for the gentleman at his time of life that he should go so far——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I say the gentleman need not worry himself about my time of life. I will take my chances with the gentleman at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts is not speaking to the question before the committee. If he insists on the point of order, the Chair will have to sustain it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very well; I will be seated and await another opportunity.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move that the gentleman be permitted to proceed in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is moved that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to proceed in order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that I am in order in what I am talking about.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. He can not get the floor without addressing the Chair.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I did address the Chair. If the gentleman will always do it himself——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed in order.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am referring to section 79 of the bill, and I wish also to refer to a matter of great interest to this House. That is, that when the Sherwood pension bill was considered here one of my constituents, speaking to me about it, said that I had done a great wrong in voting for that bill. I replied, "I do not think so."

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman can not with impunity violate the rules of the House. He is not proceeding in order.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am talking about a matter of the expenses of carrying on the Government, and this is certainly an expense of carrying on the Government. While the Sherwood pension bill was under consideration, or after it had been voted upon, I was criticized for a vote that I had cast in this House on a bill that involved an expenditure on the part of the Government. This man said to me that he had proof in his possession to show that the Pension Department was honeycombed with fraud.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, if he will proceed in order——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, this gentleman said he had information in his possession to show that the Pension Department was honeycombed with fraud; that the pension roll had upon it a number of men and women who were not lawfully pensioned; and he said that when I was voting for pension legislation I was voting for fraudulent action on the part of the Government of the United States. I did not know then where he got his information. I said: "Will you furnish me information upon which your statements are based?" He said: "I will gladly do so." I replied: "If you will do that, I will have the matter investigated." In due time he sent me a list of pensions which had been granted, and which he stated were unlawfully granted, and that they took money from the Treasury in behalf of women who were not widows of soldiers and men who did not possess an honorable discharge, and that the evidence had been furnished to the Pension Department, and that department had declined to remove these names from the pension rolls.

I took that matter to the Pension Department and it was investigated. At that time I did not know anything about where my friend obtained his information. An answer was made to charges, and I ask permission to put in the RECORD the correspondence which will show that the statements in an article published in the World's Work was not borne out by the facts. This article was written by William Bayard Hale. In due time I sent the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions to the gentleman who had complained to me, and he wrote a letter to the World's Work, and this magazine was published by Doubleday, Page & Co.—Mr. Page is now ambassador to England and is or was a member of that firm—asking them if they would publish the statement of the Pension Department showing that William Bayard Hale had published an article that was honeycombed with misstatements. They declined to publish that article. I have the letter of the late Commissioner of Pensions in my possession which makes a reply in detail regarding the charges made against the Pension Department, and I think it is a very good time to have this correspondence published in the RECORD, and this correspondence will appear at the close of my remarks. This man Hale has been sent to Mexico with a roving commission, and, so far as I have been able to discover in watching his proceedings, he has been dealing with the parties who have endeavored to overthrow such government as they have there; and it seems to me that it is a credit to such government as they have there that they were generous enough to allow him to draw his breath after he arrived there. It may have been that he was working in the interest of peace, but his methods in my judgment were more toward the encouragement of strife and disorder than the promotion of peace between nations. William Bayard Hale is the man whom the President of the United States commissioned to represent him in the Republic of Mexico. I am very sorry to speak of this fact and did not desire to do it, but I feel justified in so doing because of my knowledge of the facts which will appear in the appended correspondence and also because of the lame defense that has been made here against the statement made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], and I am sure that I can furnish the proof of every statement that I have made upon this floor to-day. [Applause.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, April 18, 1911.

Hon. W. S. GREENE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GREENE: With regard to the matter referred to in our recent conversation, and in the letter of your correspondent which you transmitted under date of the 15th instant, I have the honor to state that I have personally examined the papers in the claims and find the facts as follows:

Judge Stillwell, our first deputy commissioner, is pensioned at the rate of $30 per month under the provisions of a special act of Congress approved February 18, 1909, some time prior to his being appointed to his present position.

Mr. Stillwell entered the military service on January 7, 1862, as a private, rose through the grades of corporal, sergeant, second lieutenant to first lieutenant, and was discharged September 8, 1865, after nearly four years' faithful and meritorious service. He never filed a claim for pension until after the passage of the "age act," act of February 6, 1907. He filed a claim under this act on February 16, 1907, which was allowed at $12 per month, he being past the age of 62 years. As heretofore stated, his present pension of $30 per month was allowed by a special act of Congress, and the reasons which prompted Congress to make such allowance may be learned from the report of the committee which recommended such action

I doubt if there have been many claims in all the thousands which have received favorable consideration by Congress which had more to commend them, and there is not one single feature of the matter which casts the least discredit upon Congress, this bureau, or Mr. Stillwell. The allowance was made before there was any thought of his being appointed to his present position.

Matilda Delair was never pensioned in her own right. She filed a claim for widow's pension on December 8, 1887, but abandoned the prosecution of same and it has never been allowed. She was shown to be the legal widow of one Frank Delair, who had a claim for pension pending when he died, and as this claim was established it was allowed and paid to her under the provision of the law which entitles a widow to the pension due her deceased husband to the time of his death.

An examination of the papers in this claim does not show that there was any impropriety in the allowance made. There appears to have been some hesitancy in making the allowance, because of the fact that it carried a considerable amount of money, and because the widow was not legally married to soldier until five days prior to his death, and because of these conditions the claim received the personal consideration of the then Commissioner of Pensions and the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, both of whom approved of the allowance. Although the widow was not legally married to soldier until just prior to his death, she had lived with him as his wife for 17 years prior to their ceremonial marriage. I do not think there could be any doubt as to her being soldier's legal widow, and if there could be any question as to whether the soldier's claim was legally established it could only be a matter of opinion on the weight of the evidence. There is nothing whatever in the case to indicate that the claim was fraudulent or that the allowance was influenced by improper motives.

Catherine Giesbers was allowed pension as the widow of one John Giesbers, a soldier whose wife and widow she had been. In prosecuting her claim she, however, concealed the fact that she had remarried. The bureau later secured information as to this fact and dropped her name from the pension roll, and at the same time brought criminal action against the claimant in the local courts. The payment of her pension was not "continued," as stated by your correspondent, and she has not received pension since July 4, 1903, when her name was dropped from the roll.

Leon A. Canter died December 24, 1910. At the time of his death he was in receipt of pension under the age act of February 6, 1907, and he had previously drawn pension under the act of June 27, 1890. There is nothing in the case to indicate that any allowance therein was improper. Your correspondent states that he was "a notoriously bad egg." I do not know exactly what this means or whether it is true. There is nothing in the case reflecting on Mr. Canter's character. But if he had been of an altogether disreputable or even criminal character such fact would not necessarily have affected his title to pension. It is of course to be regretted, but it is unfortunately true, that among the hundreds of thousands who served the country in its hour of need, and are legally entitled to pension, are some who are not of the highest type of citizenship, but this fact does not affect their title to pension.

Rosetta Jackson was allowed pension as the widow of one Henderson Horton, a colored soldier, whose slave wife she had at one time been. In prosecuting her claim she concealed the fact that she had separated from Horton and remarried to one Jackson, whose wife she was at the time of the close of the war. When the bureau learned of this fact her name was dropped from the pension roll and criminal action was brought against her. She has not received pension sinc May 4, 1899, when he name was dropped.

Phoebe Wright was originally and properly pensioned as the widow of a soldier, one Byron Wright, which pension terminated on March 4, 1875, by reason of her remarriage. She afterwards sought to have her pension restored on the ground that her remarriage was void. Her claim for restoration was rejected while Mr. Evans was commissioner, but your correspondent is in error in stating that the pension was "afterwards restored." It has never been restored, and she has not received pension since 1875.

This is the status of the six cases mentioned by your correspondent. If the magazine articles referred to by your correspondent contained statements of fact at variance with what is herein set forth, such statements were inaccurate.

I do not mean to imply that the magazine intentionally misstated facts, but the information on which the articles were based was probably not full and complete in all cases, being from sources outside the bureau, and the recitals of facts were to an extent misleading because of their incompleteness.

Most of the cases mentioned in the articles referred to were those wherein the bureau had unearthed the fraud, had terminated the pension, and had presented the facts to the proper local officials for such criminal action as should be deemed warranted by the evidence in each particular case—in fact, cases in which the bureau had done its full duty in safeguarding and protecting the interests of the Government.

I have never quite understood what purpose was intended to be served by the recitals set out. I am not inclined to believe that it was intended as a reflection upon the bureau, for even the most unreasonable would hardly contend that the bureau should be able to absolutely prevent the successful prosecution of a fraudulent claim. More than 2,000,000 claimants have been before the bureau in the past 40 years, and of a necessity most of the claims have had to be adjudicated upon ex parte evidence. Under such conditions, with human nature what it is, there is bound to be some fraud. It is rare, however, that this remains undetected. Much of it is detected in time to save the Government from any loss, while in the remaining cases the allowance of the claim usually leads to detection. In such cases I do not think that the bureau has ever failed to act promptly in terminating the pension and taking such further action as the circumstances called for. The cases cited in articles referred to are, as stated, almost entirely a résumé of those in which the bureau had taken such action, and I rather suspect that much of the data for these articles was drawn from the records and criminal dockets of the courts in which actions had been brought under information furnished by the bureau. The record as made up in the articles when properly understood is therefore one creditable to the bureau rather than the reverse.

Very respectfully,

J. L. DAVENPORT, Commissioner.

FALL RIVER, MASS., March 5, 1911.

Hon. WM. S. GREENE, Washington.

DEAR SIR: In pursuance of our conversation of a few days since, I have to give you a few names of pensioners who are said by the World's Work to be humbugs.

It must be admitted that many of the reporters are simply trying to make good stories. We innocent readers are at their mercy until we can disprove their yarns

It is, however, a notorious fact that the Treasury has been and is being raided in the name of "patriotism" by bounty jumpers and other humbugs, and why not acknowledge it?

These names are but a few of those enumerated by the magazine. If they are names of maligned people, why, I will make further quotations:

Leander Stillwell, Deputy Commissioner of Pensions, at $3,600 a year, and said to be a pensioner improperly.

Matilde Delair, No. 420157; Examiner Taylor, representing the United States, was denounced and recommended for dismissal by Pension Commissioner Raum for doubting the propriety of giving this pension.

Catherine Giesbers, No. 381559, acknowledged fraudulent, but no further action taken, except to continue payment.

Leon A. Canter, No. 1050289, a notoriously bad egg.

Rosetta Jackson, No. 256905, ditto.

Phoebe Wright, No. 158348, rejected by Evans (he was too busy an agent honestly trying to protect the Government, and was, it is well known, hounded out of office by the "patriots") and afterwards restored.

There is probably no use in amplifying this list. Suffice it to say that no good citizen begrudges a cent of the pension appropriation that is being properly expended, but every good citizen does and ought to denounce the looting of the public till.

If I shall prove to be in the wrong in this matter, nobody can be more prompt than I shall be to own my error.

Yours, truly,

V. W. HAUGHWOUT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 19, 1911.

Mr. VELONA W. HAUGHWOUT,
Fall River, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Your letter came duly to hand, and I thank you for writing me.

I inadvertently mislaid your letter, and when I took it to the commissioner and talked with him about the cases I supposed his stenographer had taken notes of the letter. As he could not find the letter, and he had not taken the notes, it delayed consideration.

I may state that I know the deputy commissioner, Mr. Stillwell, and I believe him to be strictly honest, and his record as a soldier is of the best, and his service was for four years. Regarding Commissioner J. L. Davenport, he has been in the Pension Bureau for more than 25 years. He was appointed commissioner, solely upon his record, by President Taft, and he has the confidence and esteem of every Member of both branches of Congress, because of the thorough and independent and painstaking manner in which he has administered every trust that has been confided to him. This article in the World's Work I never saw. Whoever wrote it undoubtedly wrote for pay and was not particular about his facts.

I have been over hundreds of cases in behalf of many of my soldier constituents and their widows during the past 12 years and 9 months, and I unhesitatingly declare that the Pension Bureau goes into every case with great care, to provide against injustice and also to prevent fraud. The array of documents and testimony in each case would be surprising to anyone who should take the trouble to look up the cases.

There may be fraudulent cases now on the pension roll, but in every case when fraud is shown the case is stricken from the roll and the pension is declared void.

A word as to special pension bills. It is not within the power of a Member of Congress to rush a case to a settlement. Every case for a special pension bill is referred to a pension examiner, who goes through the case with a fine-tooth comb, and a full report is printed and submitted to Congress. These reports are all placed in the hands of the President before he signs the bill, and he has them all looked over by a special examiner. These reports are a part of the record, and they are preserved. If a man has not an honorable discharge, he can not be pensioned. The record of a soldier is sometimes changed if an error is found after investigation, but that is carefully gone over. The Government of the United States is a great institution and its work and the records thereof are marvels of history.

I am glad to send you the information in the cases you referred to.

I remain, very respectfully,

WM. S. GREENE.

Mr. VELONA W. HAUGHWOUT,

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a letter relative to the status of Gen. Daniel E. Sickles.

He draws no pension and never applied for nor is he eligible to receive one. He is simply on the retired list, just the same as Brig. Gen. Cook, of our city.

I remain, very respectfully,

WM. S. GREENE.

FALL RIVER, MASS., April 28, 1911.

To the WORLD'S WORK, New York.

GENTLEMEN: I have been a diligent reader of your magazine for a long time, and I was so much impressed by your disclosures regarding the alleged frauds against the United States that I investigated some of the cases cited by you, selecting at random, at the Pension Bureau in Washington.

I was astonished that in every instance which I had singled out for proof of rascality your history was false. The irregularity had been detected by the Government, the recipient of improperly granted moneys dropped from the rolls, and in most cases criminal procedure taken against the culprit.

If you desire the substantiation of the truth of my words, I shall take pleasure in submitting it.

I read to find the truth, not a sensation, and I am sure that a magazine of the class you are supposed to represent will be glad to correct your errors when they are pointed out to you.

Yours, truly,

V. W. HAUGHWOUT.

DEAR SIR: We are very much obliged to you for your letter of April 28, alleging that you had investigated our incidents of pension frauds and found our accounts all false.

We should be glad to read anything you may like to offer going to substantiate your assertion.

FALL RIVER, MASS., May 4, 1911.

Messrs. DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO.,
Garden City, L. I.

GENTLEMEN: Answering yours of the 1st instant, I shall quote but three misstatements made in the World's Work in relation to the so-called "pension frauds," since the naming of others would be mere repetition.

Catherine Giesbers, No. 381559 (I quote) was allowed pension as the widow of John Giesbers, a soldier whose wife and widow she had been. In prosecuting her claim she, however, concealed the fact that she had remarried. The bureau later secured information as to this fact and dropped her name from the pension rolls, and at the same time brought criminal action against the claimant in the local courts. The payment of her pension was not "continued," as stated by your correspondent, and she has not received pension since July 4, 1903, when her name was dropped from the rolls.

Rosetta Jackson, No. 256905, was allowed pension as the widow of one Henderson Horton, a colored soldier whose slave wife she had at one time been. In prosecuting her claim she concealed the fact that she had separated from Horton and remarried to one Jackson, whose wife she was at the time of the close of the war. When the bureau learned of this fact, her name was dropped from the pension rolls and criminal action was brought against her. She has not received pension since May 4, 1899, when her name was dropped.

Phoebe Wright, No. 158348, was originally and properly pensioned as the widow of a soldier—one Byron Wright—which pension terminated on March 4, 1875, by reason of her remarriage. She afterwards sought to have her pension restored on the ground that her remarriage was void. Her claim for restoration was rejected while Mr. Evans was commissioner, but your correspondent is in error in stating that the pension was "afterwards restored." It has never been restored and she has not received pension since 1875.

DEAR SIR: I have a letter dated Fall River, May 4, signed in typewriting with your name, and at the beginning you say "I shall quote but three misstatements made in the World's Work," etc.

You then proceed to quote, but the quotations are not from the World's Work, although they refer to cases we give. I think there is some confusion of punctuation, and I do not quite understand the letter. Won't you please tell me from whom you are quoting in the extracts you give?

Yours, truly,

FALL RIVER, MASS., May 18, 1911.

Messrs. DOUBLEDAY, PAGE & CO.,
Garden City.

GENTLEMEN: Some letters have passed between us relating to certain misstatements found in your magazine, the World's Work, about alleged frauds in pension distributions by the United States Government.

I write again simply to inquire whether you are satisfied that you misled your readers in some of the denunciations contained in some of your articles.

The main source of information open to many thousands of busy people on topics of public interest is found in the magazines; if that source proves to be a poisoned one, the minds of the people must become infected.

There are but few periodicals which are at all reliable, and I had always rated yours among the few. I hope I may be told by you that you intend to keep its rating unsmirched by acknowledging your errors when they are unmistakably pointed out to you.

Yours, truly,

V. W. HAUGHWOUT.

THE WORLD'S WORK,
Garden City, Long Island, N. Y., June 1, 1911.

V. W. HAUGHWOUT, Esq.,
Fall River, Mass.

DEAR SIR: You are right; there has been some exchange of letters between us relating to certain statements—not misstatements—made by me in the World's Work about pension frauds.

You have written somewhat ambiguously, declaring that our citations of the cases of Catherine Giesbers, Rosetta Jackson, and Phoebe Wright were misstatements. To which I can only reply that, on the contrary, the three paragraphs about these women are absolutely correct in every fact and circumstance.
